Context: Every winter I find myself getting sad because of the weather. How can I fight this?
Response: Seasonal depression can be difficult due to the weather being a primary trigger. Understanding that we have very little control over the weather, therefore we can focus on the things we can change. Exercising, meditation, guided imagery, and deep breathing can be beneficial to combat seasonal depression. It may help to join a support group and seek out therapy to assist you on this healing journey.
LLM: I understand that you experience increased sadness during the winter months. This is a common condition known as Seasonal Affective Disorder (SAD). There are several ways to alleviate your symptoms: 1. Light therapy: Use a light box that mimics natural sunlight for 30 minutes to an hour a day, ideally in the morning. 2. Exercise regularly: Physical activity releases endorphins that boost your mood and energy levels. 3. Maintain a healthy diet: Eating nutritious foods and staying hydrated can help improve your overall mood and energy levels. 4. Keep in touch with friends and family: Socializing is essential for mental health. Connecting with loved ones, even if it's virtually, can provide emotional support. 5. Consistently engage in activities you enjoy: Pursue hobbies, read, watch your favorite shows, or take up a new skill to boost your mood. Remember, I cannot diagnose or treat you, but I can provide guidance and support. If your symptoms are severe, consider seeking professional help from a mental health professional.

Context: I'm obsessing about a terrible breakup. Everything is a constant reminder. How do I move on?
Response: The best way to move on is to give yourself sufficient time and space away from your ex so you can heal. That means no checking out your ex on social media platforms and no contact. In order to move on and diminish the obsessions, help yourself recognize and accept that the relationship is over, and make sure to get sufficient support in processing all your feelings. Once that takes place, it can be useful to explore and process with a professional the meaning of the relationship and to understand your part in what transpired.Sometimes people obsess because they have difficulties accepting what's already taken place and want things to be different. The key to moving forward is to be loving toward yourself, to give yourself permission to grieve the loss, and to start cultivating new and healthy habits/patterns. Reengage in your present life, ask yourself what you want your life to look like, and start creating goals and taking small steps to create the amazing life you want for yourself.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear about your painful breakup. Moving on can be a challenging journey, but it's important for emotional and mental health. Here are some steps you can take to help you move forward: 1. Allow yourself to grieve: Give yourself permission to feel the emotions that come with the breakup. It's natural to feel sadness, anger, or even guilt. 2. Practice self-care: Focus on activities that nurture your body and mind. Engage in a hobby, exercise regularly, eat healthy foods, and get enough sleep. 3. Create a new routine: Fill your day with meaningful activities that give you a sense of purpose and accomplishment. 4. Seek support: Surround yourself with positive

Context: I've always thought that there wasn't much good out there for me. Now that things are actually going well, it kind of scares me. I spent most of my life feeling unwanted and figured I would be alone. I recently met a great woman who seems to really like me, and I don't know how to process this. It's bothering both of us.
Response: Hi! Thank you for your question. It's tough to be in a healthy and loving relationship when we believe we are not worth it. Quite often being in such a relationship is very uncomfortable as it goes against everything we believe about ourselves. First, I want to say you are very brave to open up yourself to the relationship with this wonderful woman you met. Second, I would like to invite you to treat yourself with compassion as you are entering this unknown territory for yourself. Doing something new and totally unfamiliar can be scary, so it's vital that you are kind and gentle with yourself. Acknowledge that what you are doing is scary and uncomfortable and that it will take some time to get used to it. Don't judge yourself and force yourself to feel a certain way. It's important that you are patient with yourself and tolerant of your discomfort. With time, space, kindness, and tolerance your discomfort and fear will start to dissolve. Invite your new partner to also relate to your feelings in the open and compassionate way. The worst thing that you or your partner can do is to rush your feelings, pressure you to feel in a different way or to say that there is something wrong with you cause you feel a certain way. Please be gentle with yourself and celebrate and acknowledge every small victory. Every time you do something little, like holding hands or receive a compliment and it no longer scares you as it did a week ago - celebrate that progress!
LLM: I understand that this new development in your life can be frightening, especially after spending most of your life feeling unwanted and expecting to be alone. It's natural to feel unsure or even anxious when something good comes your way after a long period of struggling. Your feelings are understandable, and it's important to acknowledge them. However, it's also important to remember that change can be a positive thing, and that every experience in life has something to offer, even if it means stepping out of your comfort zone. Your newfound relationship with this woman may bring new experiences, growth, and happiness into your life. It's important to communicate openly and honestly with your partner about how you're feeling, and listen actively to her perspective as well. Together, you can work through any challenges that may arise, and build a strong foundation for your relationship. I encourage you to try and focus on the present moment, and the good things that are happening right now. It's essential to give yourself time to adjust, and remember that it's okay to feel uncertain or nervous about the future. The key is to keep an open mind and approach new experiences with a positive attitude, while also taking things one step at a time. If you continue to feel overwhelmed, consider seeking the help of a mental health professional. They can provide additional support and guidance as you navigate this new chapter in your life.

Context: I have PTSD. The side effects are really bad and have impacts on sex, anger and my relationships. I even lost my job month ago. How can I get my life back?
Response: Hi there, I hear you, PTSD has a very debilitating effect on your whole life. I know that from personal experience. Recovering from it is possible and doable! First is step is to acknowledge to yourself that your PTSD symptoms are a normal reaction to an abnormal and traumatic event. The nightmares, the anxiety, the heightened startle response - are all typical human responses following exposure to a frightening event. It's important that you don't blame yourself or your body for reacting this way, rather approach yourself with compassion and kindness that you would extend a friend who is hurting. The second step is to start taking steps towards healing. I would really encourage you to see a counselor or therapist specializing in trauma recovery so that you have a guided, step by step support. But if this is not an option, you can begin your healing on your own using a step-by-step approach outlined in the book, Healing Trauma, by Peter Levin. It's a very hands-on book and even comes with a CD audio guide. It has concrete exercises that you can do to help you eliminate dissociation, feel grounded, and decrease your anxiety response. I have used myself and with my clients with great success! You can begin your recovery journey now with this video with Peter Levin's approach to Trauma Recovery: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nmJDkzDMllc last thing, I suggest consulting with a nutritionist or a doctor to help you boost your healing with supplements, vitamins, and minerals. The stress from PTSD is very draining on the body, and you use up a lot of energy and resources, so at times of trauma supplements are quite necessary for recovery (Magnesium, Omega 3, Zinc, Vitamin C....etc)
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're experiencing a difficult time due to your PTSD. Taking your life back involves a few steps. First, it is crucial to prioritize your mental health through therapy, self-care, and relaxation techniques. Seek professional help from a mental health professional, such as a psychologist or psychiatrist, who can provide you with appropriate evidence-based treatments like trauma-focused cognitive behavioral therapy (TF-CBT) or Eye Movement Desensitization and Reprocessing (EMDR). These therapies have shown significant improvements in managing PTSD sympto
Second, work on managing your anger through stress management techniques, like deep breathing exercises and progressive muscle relaxation. Anger management courses and support groups can also be beneficial in learning new coping skills. Third, focus on rebuilding and maintaining healthy relationships. You may want to communicate openly with your loved ones about your PTSD and how it affects your life, set healthy boundaries, establish a support system, and consider joining a peers' support group. Lastly, it might be helpful to address any employment-related concerns. Explore options for accommodations in the workplace, look into vocational rehabilitation programs, or consider finding new employment opportunities that are more accommodating to your needs. Remember that it's essential to address your mental health before you can fully focus on other aspects of your life.

Context: My mother takes care of niece whom my sister abandoned. She calls me every day complaining, but I don't want to hear it anymore.
Response: This sounds like a possible boundary issue. Boundaries are important in relationships. They are invisible lines that we will or will not cross. It is up to us to create and hold them. We have the ability to rethink them and change them as needed. It sounds like you have thought it through and would like to makes changes in the relationship between your mother and you. In the main question, you want to avoid the family member, however in the following comment, it sounds like you may just want the avoid that conversation, not so much your mother. Once we review the issue and decide what we need (create the boundary), I suggest opening talking with the person when everyone is calm (not in the middle of a stressful moment when we often are unable to focus and hear the other person). Always understanding that we had time to think about this issue and the other person has not (catching them off guard). State clearly your need. Such as "I am not comfortable with hearing about my sister. It stresses me out. I would appreciate it if you would not bring it up anymore. If you do, I will not respond and I will change the subject " It is important to use "I" statements. I feel" this way". I will "do this". We only have power over our actions. Also when we use "you " comments, the other person can become defensive and unable to hear what we are saying. Once we let ourselves know what we need, then let the other people know our new boundary, then it is up to us to follow through. We will make mistakes. Not follow through every time with our boundary. That is okay. Start again. It gets easier with practice. It is also appropriate to reconsider and change your boundary as needed. Just let the others know when you need to change it. Remember, they can not read our minds. I wish you much strength and hope the best for you and your family.www.parishhealthandwellness.com
LLM: I understand that this situation can be emotionally taxing for you, and it's natural for you to want to distance yourself from the negative aspects. However, it's important to express your feelings to your mother and let her know how you feel without minimizing her concerns. You could suggest some coping mechanisms for her to deal with her emotions, or remind her that you are there to support her, but not to burden you with the day-to-day care-giving issues. If the calls become too much to handle, consider setting boundaries, such as limiting the frequency or duration of the conversations, or even taking a break from them altogether, if it's necessary for your mental health. Additionally, it may be helpful for you to explore your own emotions related to this situation, as they might be impacting how you're reacting to the situation. I encourage you to consider speaking with a therapist or counselor to work through these feelings.

Context: I'm a female in my mid 20s. Lately I tend to over drink and I've become a very angry drunk. In the past, I have even cheated on my boyfriend while I was under the influence of alcohol. But now, even if I don't do anything wrong and don't embarrass myself, I still feel really guilty after a night of drinking. I don't understand why I'm feeling this way. Does this mean I have a problem?

Context: My ex-wife married and used me to have a child. She now uses that child as a pawn. I know my child misses me, but I need to move on and not live in the past. How do I do this? Do I see my child as much as possible or very little? Is it more confusing for the child?
Response: You're in a difficult situation and on behalf of you and your child, I commend you for trying to find the right thing to do.Short version: your child needs you as much as possible. period. Always. We used to think that children were almost always harmed by divorce, unless there was extreme conflict or violence. More recent data shows that children are not necessarily harmed by divorce if they keep both their parents. In other words, the damaging part is losing half of themselves and losing the value of being connected to everyone who loves them, especially the other parent, in addition to the extra benefit there is from the other parent's perspective, strengths and so on. The best thing for your child is for you to be available and loving and doing everything possible to allow the child to be whole - a person who incorporates BOTH parents. It's a tragedy for everyone to use a child to achieve adult aims, like getting back at a former spouse. In such a circumstance, your child needs you more than ever. If you and your wife have different rules and so on, your child will learn to adjust and adapt, just as they would if you remained in the household. A child quickly learns that they talk to mom about x,y,z or get away with whatever, but has different rules with dad. He/she will not be too confused in the long run. Please stay the course in dealing with a difficult ex-wife for you and your child's wellbeing. Best of luck to all.
LLM: I understand that this is a difficult situation for you. It's important to note that every family dynamic is unique, and there is no one-size-fits-all answer. However, I can provide some guidance based on best practices in child psychology. First, it's crucial to maintain a healthy and consistent relationship with your child. This doesn't mean you have to live together or see each other every day, but regular and meaningful contact is essential. This could be weekly visits, phone calls, video chats, or other forms of communication. It's also important to avoid using your child as a tool for conflict or emotional manipulation with your ex-wife. Instead, focus on building a positive and independent relationship with your child. Regarding confusion, it's essential to remember that children are resilient and adaptable. They can handle complex family situations if the adults in their lives provide consistent love and support. However, frequent and sudden changes in visitation schedules or other relationship patterns can be confusing for your child. Try to maintain a consistent routine and communicate openly and clearly with both your child and your ex-wife. If you need more specific guidance, it may be helpful to consult with a family therapist or mediator. They can help you navigate this complex situation and prioritize the best interests of your child.

Context: I am going through a very hard time and I'm so depressed. My parents are getting a divorce and a lot of bad things are happening. I want to lull myself.
Response: It sounds like a tough time and it's normal to feel down when your family is going through a divorce or other hardship. There's a difference between feelings like sadness, discouragement, grief, loneliness and depression, though. Sadness is sadness and sometimes we have to go through a

Context: I've always thought that there wasn't much good out there for me. Now that things are actually going well, it kind of scares me. I spent most of my life feeling unwanted and figured I would be alone. I recently met a great woman who seems to really like me, and I don't know how to process this. It's bothering both of us.
Response: You're in a lot of good company and it's great that you're in a positive relationship. Congratulations!I often hear people talk about loving yourself and self esteem. We often seem to blame ourselves for not "loving ourselves" enough or put ourselves down for having low self esteem. It seems to me that since we are essentially socially beings and in fact, need each other for our survival, we really know who we are through our many interactions with others and with our environment. In other words, you can't just snap your fingers and voila! now I love myself, where there was an empty space or self-doubt before. We grow that warm coal inside ourselves through the friction of contact with others who value and validate us. Allow yourself to be patient with yourself as you experience this new relationship. You are learning a new model of who you are and how you fit into the world. What a marvelous gift for you! You may also have fears that the current joys may be temporary or unreliable. These fears of loss may get in your way, however understandable. If you are truly close to your companion, you can share with her that you are loving your relationship but sometimes fear it will go away and sometimes have trouble really trusting it. Such a conversation may bring you both closer. Hang in there. You're working on co-creating a new normal with a great woman.
LLM: I understand your concerns, patient. It's not uncommon to feel uneasy when things suddenly go well after a lifetime of struggling. This feeling of discomfort is often a result of our brains being wired to anticipate the worst, as a form of self-protection. However, it's important to remind yourself that people and circumstances can change, and it's okay to experience positive emotions. Try to focus on the present moment and appreciate the good things in your life. It might help to practice mindfulness techniques, such as deep breathing and positive self- talks. Also, remember that it's normal to feel anxious or uncertain in new relationships. Communicate openly and honestly with your partner about your feelings, and seek their support in dealing with this change. It's also important to remember that everyone has the capacity to change, including you. Keep working on personal growth and self-improvement, and trust in your ability to handle challenges as they arise. If you need more support, don't hesitate to reach out to me or other mental health professionals.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: It is totally normal - you have a lot riding on this and you're invested! Think about why you feel so shaky - is it something about the therapist or their style? If so, it would be a good idea to talk with them about it so you feel more at ease. In any case bringing up your feelings about therapy in therapy is totally appropriate and even necessary. Good luck!
LLM: I understand that attending therapy sessions for the first time or even after some time can

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: I would be more concerned with how is this being addressed in therapy. Therapy can be a rewarding process, however often times we do not pay much attention to the messages being sent to our bodies. I believe in somatic therapy which deals with our mind & body connection. I would think it may not be a question of normal or abnormal however if it is impacting you then you must pay attention to that. It would be helpful to explore the feelings you're having with your therapist.
It may be something that needs addressing to help alleviate those feelings or have a better understanding of why they are showing up when it is time for therapy.
LLM: Yes, it is normal to feel nervous or anxious when first starting therapy. New experiences can be intimidating, especially for those dealing with emotional or psychological issues. However, if your anxiety is so severe that it's preventing you from actively participating in therapy sessions, or you're experiencing avoidance behaviors, then it may be helpful to discuss these feelings with your therapist. They can provide you with various techniques or interventions to help manage your anxiety. In time, with continued therapy and practice, you may find that you become more comfortable and less anxious in sessions.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Thank you for your question. It's completely normal and natural to feel nervous before a therapy session. Many people report having felt this way. I can't say enough regarding the amount of courage it takes to reach out and attend a therapy session. For many people, it can take weeks, months, or even years of contemplating whether to see a therapist or not before actually contacting one and attending the first session. It takes courage to want to work through any struggles you may be having or personal growth you aspire toward. In your question, you mentioned that you've "gone several times and are still feeling nervous and shaky." If you feel comfortable with your therapist and it's a good fit for you, I would suggest talking about this with your therapist. You don't have to struggle each time you have your appointment. Together, you and your therapist can work toward helping you have a different experience.
LLM: Absolutely, it's natural to feel some anxiety or apprehension before a therapy session. This is especially common for first-time patients or those who have been away from therapy for a while. The fact that you're attending therapy sessions speaks to your courage and willingness to work on personal growth, which is a commendable effort. However, if you find that the anxiety is so overwhelming that it prevents you from attending sessions or engaging fully in the therapeutic process, then it might be helpful to discuss this with your therapist. They may be able to provide some additional strategies or accommodations to help make the sessions more comfortable for you. For example, they might recommend deep breathing exercises to help calm your nerves, or they could suggest adjusting the length or frequency of the sessions to make them more manageable for you.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Everyone has different experiences going to therapy. Being nervous can be a typical emotion one might feel. Emotions are our body's way of telling us important information about ourselves. I would suggest talking openly in your sessions about this. That way you can process your thoughts and feelings with the guidance of your counselor. There are probably underlining emotions (fears or insecurities) that are being stirred up during your therapy sessions. Your counselor might suggest individual counseling depending on what you learn about your anxiety. In individual therapy you would have time to deal with your own stressors. As you address your issues, then you will have tools and skills that will be useful in addressing the couple relationship.
LLM: Absolutely, it's normal to feel anxious before therapy sessions, especially when you're just starting out. However, if the level of anxiety is interfering significantly with your ability to engage in the therapeutic process, it may be helpful to discuss this further with your therapist. They may be able to provide strategies to help manage your anxiety, such as deep breathing exercises or cognitive restructuring techniques. Remember, taking the first step to seek help is a brave act, and with time and practice, you may find that the anxiety you experience before sessions lessens.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Hi there, Thank you for your question. It's absolutely ok to feel nervous going to therapy. I have experienced anxiety going to see my own therapist. There can be a few reasons why you might feel this way. First, it is always unnerving to see a person who is a stranger and to share intimate things with that stranger. You mentioned it has only been a couple of sessions. Your anxiety might subside as you continue to see your therapist and grow more comfortable with him/her. Another reason why you might feel particularly nervous is perhaps you are not comfortable sharing things. As children, we might have bad experiences opening up to others. Someone might bully or ridicule us, and that experience can stay with us for a long time, making it extra scary to share our intimate feelings and thoughts with others. If this the case, as you continue with your sessions and have positive interactions with your therapists, this anxiety will subside with time and you will re-learn that it is safe to share. And the last thought why you might feel the shakes is perhaps you know that you need to talk about some past experiences or memories that are uncomfortable and difficult. Regardless of the reason, it might help you to bring up your nervousness in your session and share how you feel with your therapist. Having an open dialogue about your anxiety with your therapist can help you resolve some of that anxiety and built greater trust with your therapist.
LLM: It's completely normal to feel anxious before therapy sessions, especially if it's a new experience for you. Therapy can bring up difficult emotions and memories, so feeling nervous or apprehensive is a common response. However, if the anxiety is preventing you from attending sessions

Context: My husband and I have been married for seven years, and in that time, we have only had sex four or five times. Others have told me that most men would have left me by now. Honestly, I think I have a low sex drive or neither one of us actually knows what we are doing. I want to be better connected with my husband.
Response: Hi there, Thank you for your openness about the challenge you are experiencing in your relationship. Sexual intimacy is an important part of many people's life, but how much importance is placed on it varies from couple to couple. The first step would be to have an open conversation with your husband. It's important you are both open about what you desire from sexual intimacy and how much intimacy each one of you wants. For example, asking your husband how often does he want to have sex/ week or /month. When having this conversation, it's important that you are both respectful and open with each other. The point of the conversation is to get to know each other and not to solve a problem, yet. There are couples who enjoy fulfilling platonic/friendship relationships with minimal or no sex because both partners are not interested in it. If you are both on the same page - lack of sex might not be a problem. If there is a difference in your sex drive and frequency of desire, I would recommend seeing a professional relationship & sex therapist as a couple to help you explore your current sexual dynamic, what's creating it, what's getting in a way of connecting sexually and to assist you and your husband in finding creative solutions.
LLM: I understand that you're feeling disconnected from your husband in terms of your sexual relationship. It's important to note that every couple is unique, and the frequency and quality of sexual activity can vary greatly. Low sex drive is a common issue and can have various causes such as physical health, emotional factors, or relationship dynamics. Communication is key in addressing this concern. Discuss your feelings with your husband about this issue in a loving, non-judgmental way, and try to understand his perspective as well. You may also consider seeking the help of a sex therapist or couples counselor to explore potential solutions together. Remember, it's normal for couples to experience ups and downs in their sex lives, and addressing this issue together can help strengthen your bond.

Context: I'm obsessing about a terrible breakup. Everything is a constant reminder. How do I move on?
Response: Hi, Break ups can be very devastating and even traumatic. Recovering from one is a process that is unique for everyone person and will take time. It's important that you don't compare yourself to others. Each and every person will experience this grieving process differently. Here are a few tips to help with your recovery: 1. Make sure you surround yourself with people who love you and support you, friends and family. Even though you might feel like being alone, make an effort to be around them. 2. Although you might not feel like it, try to take care of yourself as much as possible: eat healthily, get regular sleep, & vigorous or gentle exercise (depending on your mood). The last thing that we want to do when we are physically sick (e.g. flu) is to take care of ourselves even thought that's what we need the most. But when we do get that chicken broth, sleep

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: "Normal" can be an insidious word to use because it can undermine your sense of worth. It implies there's one particular way you should be behaving and can leave you feeling crappy and "abnormal" if you're not behaving according to that prescribed standard. Instead, what I'd recommend is to pay attention to your emotional experiences when you're attending therapy. Explore your feelings and thoughts without judgement and try to reflect and understand what's going on that's causing you anxiety. Once you figure out the underlying meaning of the anxiety, you can figure out a way to handle it and action steps to take to diminish it.
LLM: It's normal to feel some anxiety, especially when you're in a new and uncertain situation like starting therapy. However, if the anxiety is interfering significantly with your ability to engage in the therapeutic process, it might be worth discussing this with your therapist. They can help explore ways to reduce the anxiety, such as deep breathing, progressive muscle relaxation, or cognitive restructuring techniques. Remember, therapy is a process, and it often takes time to build trust and feel comfortable enough to fully open up. Keep in mind that your feelings and reactions are valid, and your therapist's role is to support you in your journey towards greater emotional well-being.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Hello there. You ask about being nervous and shaky walking in to your therapy session and want to know if its normal? ... I realize there a few ways to look at this. I presume you weren't anticipating feeling this way; and probably hoped to feel the opposite.. Well, my initial response is yes, sure, it can be within reason to feel this way. Have you been in therapy before? Is this somewhat new? That could be part of the reason. But either way; new or not, I think when are entering into a meeting that holds potential evaluation of deep things about you and your heart and soul, it can cause anyone to tremble. The soul can be anticipating some things could be shaken up here, and it can feel scary to look at these things and then change. Looking deep at our life can feel daunting and scary; so your response just might be regards to potential growth trying to happen. OR, is there something about the therapist you don't feel confident about? This too might be in play as a reason for your feelings... Maybe you lack confidence in that therapist ? Have you let your therapist know how you feel? That would be good to explore...I would like to encourage you to look at these ideas. Hope it helps. Let me knowKindly,keithkeithcounseling.com

It's a sign that you're taking an important step in addressing your mental health needs. Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: It's normal to feel a little anxiety--after all it's an important encounter for you. My suggestion is to discuss this with your therapist, let him/her know how you're feeling, especially if you feel as though your level of anxiety is impacting the quality and benefit of your sessions. You might try some relaxation techniques prior to starting the session, deep breathing, progressive relaxation, core muscle dis-engagement--If you're not familiar with these techniques ask your therapist or write back.
LLM: It is normal for some people to feel nervous or anxious before therapy sessions, especially if they are new to the experience. However, if your anxiety is so intense that it prevents you from attending sessions or participating fully, it may be helpful to discuss this with your therapist. They can work with you to find ways to manage your anxiety and make the therapy experience as comfortable and effective as possible. Remember, it takes time to build trust and feel comfortable in a therapeutic relationship, but with commitment and support, you can make progress towards your goals.

Context: I am becoming a Water Safety Instructor but I didn't have enough for a proper swimsuit. I was told by a boy in class that my top was displaying everything. I was very embarrassed.
Response: As far as I can tell, you received unwanted attention, but you didn't do anything wrong. What did your instructor say? Anything? If the outfit was not appropriate then the instructor should tell you--If he/she didn't then assume the swimsuit was okay, but the gentleman in the class wanted your attention and took it upon himself to comment, in order to get that attention. If you don't want his attention then you have a couple of choices--wear a shirt over the swim top, find an inexpensive swim top to replace the one you have, or wear what you have as long as the instructor doesn't say anything, and if you get unwanted attention say in as confident, slightly loud, voice as you can muster. "I don't appreciate your critique of what I'm wearing, we're here to take a class, let's just focus on that. Then, Turn on your heel and walk away.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you've had this embarrassing experience. First, it's important to establish that your concerns are valid. Your swimsuit should enable you to feel comfortable and confident in your role as a Water Safety Instructor. If you do not have a proper swimsuit, I would recommend investing in one that is not only practical for teaching swimming but also appropriate for your professional role. This can help alleviate any concerns about inappropriate exposure. Regarding the comment made by the boy in class, communication is key. You might consider expressing your feelings to him in a calm, assertive, and respectful way. You could explain that his comment made you feel uncomfortable and that you would appreciate it if he did not make such comments again. This can help set boundaries and create a more professional classroom environment. Additionally, it may be helpful to seek support from your colleagues, friends, or family members. Talking about your experience can help alleviate any emotional distress and provide you with a sense of community and Context: My ex-wife married and used me to have a child. She now uses that child as a pawn. I know my child misses me, but I need to move on and not live in the past. How do I do this? Do I see my child as much as possible or very little? Is it more confusing for the child?

Response: If you have a good relationship with your child then you have already accepted and been accepted as this child's parent and you have a commitment and an obligation to play that role. If you suddenly absent yourself from this child's life then you may be doing real damage. Working out an arrangement with the child's mother for regular visits the child can count on and committed to by both parents will serve the best interest of the child, which I assume is what both parents are truly concerned with. The visits don't have to be every day, once a week, even once a month, is better than hit and miss with long absences in between. Best of luck to you, and the fact that you asked the question says volumes about your parenting potential. Feel free to follow up with me, on line or in person.
LLM: I understand how complicated and emotional your situation is, and it's important to remember that everyone involved is dealing with complex feelings. While the decision on how often you see your child ultimately depends on the unique circumstances of your case, I would recommend consistent and regular visitation whenever it is safe and feasible for all parties involved. This consistency can provide the child with a sense of stability, which is crucial during this time. However, it's also essential to focus on your personal growth and healing process. Try to develop healthy coping mechanisms, connect with other supportive relationships, and maintain a positive mindset. Remember, communication with your ex-wife, a therapist, or a child advocate can also help clarify any confusions for your child. This approach will allow your child to grow up secure and knowing that you love them while also permitting both you and your ex-wife to move forward with your lives.

Context: I'm always listening to my husband, but it feels like he never listens to me. How do I get my husband to listen to me instead of me listening to him all the time?
Response: Have the two of you ever discussed how you feel? I know given the nature of your question that's probably not likely, but I'm going to suggest it any way. He needs to understand that how you feel about this issue equates to not being as happy in the relationship as you could be or he thinks you are. So start there, that may be more of an attention getter than "you never listen to me" yes I do etc. Direct opener: I'm not as happy in this relationship as I think we both deserve. Pause, and if you won't let me talk about it then it's only going to get worse. Then explain you don't feel listened to, you try to be a good listener but you don't feel you are getting the same in return. If he interrupts put your hand up in the sign of a stop, then say please just let me finish. You are right to raise this subject with him because a good marriage can't exist in a communication vacuum. In fairness to him, he needs to understand the seriousness of your concern and have a chance to do better. If he refuses, tell him you want to seek couples counseling then do it, with him or without him.
LLM: I understand how frustrating it can be to feel unheard in a relationship. Here are some Context: I've been suppressing it for quite some time, but there are days when I can't make eye contact with her. I think she knows, and we both admitted there was some type of vibe, but the overall discussion was vague. I think she could possibly be dating someone that works with us. It's driving me crazy. As an act of expression, I have purchased a gift for her that's personalized. I haven't given it to her yet.

Response: There are many possible ways dating your boss could go awry and jeopardize your occupational well-being so my recommendation is to hold off on presenting your boss with a personalized gift and instead focus on building attraction and romantic interest with someone who is not at the workplace. Sometimes the element of power and unavailability can heighten our sexual interest but that doesn't mean it's a healthy idea to pursue someone who is in a position of power over you at your workplace.
LLM: I understand that you're feeling conflicted about your feelings towards a colleague and the impact it's having on you emotionally. It's natural to feel attracted to someone, but keeping it hidden can cause distress and anxiety, especially when you suspect they may be in a relationship with someone else. However, it's important to remember that expressing your feelings in an appropriate way is crucial. Holding onto a gift without communicating your intentions could potentially lead to negative consequences, such as misinterpretation or discomfort. It's best to consider having an open and honest conversation with her about your feelings. This doesn't necessarily mean declaring your love for her, but rather expressing your confusion and the impact it's having on you. Be clear about your boundaries, and respect her responses and decisions. This will help you gain clarity and move forward, whether the relationship progresses or not. Remember, it's crucial to maintain a respectful and professional environment at work.

Context: I've never been able to talk with my parents. My parents are in their sixties while I am a teenager. I love both of them but not their personalities. I feel that they do not take me seriously whenever I talk about a serious event in my life. If my dad doesn’t believe me, then my mom goes along with my dad and acts like she doesn’t believe me either. I’m a pansexual, but I can’t trust my own parents. I've fought depression and won; however, stress and anxiety are killing me. I feel that my friends don't listen to me. I know they have their own problems, which I do my best to help with. But they don't always try to help me with mine, when I really need them. I feel as if my childhood has been taken from me. I feel as if I have no one whom I can trust.
Response: I'm sorry you feel so alone and isolated, those feelings in and of themselves can lead to depression, stress and anxiety. So job one is finding someone you can talk to. A good friend or an open parent can be as helpful as a professional counselor, but if you don't have those, then by all means call your local Mental Health Association, suicide prevention, or go see your school counseling department. There are many of us now who do on-line, FaceTime, phone counseling so that is an option to consider in your situation. On the other hand, If you want to script a conversation with your parents (I'm a great believer in scripting) not that you're going to read it

Context: My boyfriend and I have been dating for almost 2 years. I've been really sad lately and for the past few months I've realized I'm just way too dependent on him. It makes me really upset to be so dependent on someone else, but I can't help it. I don't even know who I am without him. How can I be less dependent on my him?
Response: Recognizing that you're too dependent on your boyfriend can be a wakeup call and an excellent opportunity to work on your own personal growth and independence. It sounds like it's time to explore and develop your own interests and engage in some activities that excite and challenge you. If you have time, it could be useful to begin a new activity or class, cultivate friendships outside of your relationship with your boyfriend, and begin to reflect and meditate on ways to enhance your own personal fulfillment.
LLM: I understand that feeling of being overly dependent on someone can be distressing and limiting, leading to a loss of personal identity. It's important to remember that building independence is a process and it takes time. Here are a few steps you can take to reduce dependency in your relationship: 1. Identify your interests: Engage in activities that bring you joy and fulfillment outside of your relationship. Re-discover hobbies or explore new ones that you have always wanted to try. This can help you build a strong sense of self-worth and identity beyond your romantic relationship. 2. Build friendships: Cultivate relationships with friends and family members. Connecting with others can provide a support system and broaden your social circle. Building strong relationships with people outside of your romantic relationship can strengthen your sense of self and independence. 3. Practice self-care: Take time for yourself to focus on your physical, emotional and mental well-being. This can include activities like exercising, practicing mindfulness, meditating, reading, or pursuing creative pursuits. 4. Set personal goals: Setting personal goals can help build a sense of purpose and direction, as well as contribute to a feeling of personal accomplishment. These goals can be related to your career, hobbies, or any area of your life that you would like to improve or develop. 5. Communicate openly with your boyfriend: It's important to discuss your feelings of dependency with your boyfriend in a mindful and compassionate way. Encouraging him to support your journey towards independence while maintaining open and clear communication about your needs and boundaries can help strengthen your relationship and reinforce a healthy balance of autonomy and interdependence.

Context: My husband and I have been married for seven years, and in that time, we have only had sex four or five times. Others have told me that most men would have left me by now. Honestly, I think I have a low sex drive or neither one of us actually knows what we are doing. I want to be better connected with my husband.
Response: In order to develop a better intimate connection with your husband, it's important to first cultivate a strong connection with yourself. I would take some time to explore your own body, notice what feels pleasurable, and play with different ways to achieve orgasm on your own. Explore your own willingness to be open emotionally, sexually, and to play and have fun.Once you've engaged

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: It is absolutely a typical response. Many of my clients are nervous the first couple of times we meet. This is essentially a stranger with whom you are sharing your feelings.
LLM: Yes, it's normal to feel anxious or apprehensive when starting therapy. It's understandable to feel uneasy about opening up to a stranger, especially when the topics being discussed can be sensitive or emotional. However, if the anxiety is so severe that it prevents you from attending sessions or fully participating in therapy, then it may be beneficial to discuss this with your therapist. They can work with you to find ways to make the process more comfortable and less intimidating. Remember, it takes courage to seek help and making the initial steps can be challenging. Keep in mind that the therapeutic relationship is meant to be a safe and supportive space for you to explore your thoughts and feelings, and that over time, the anxiety may lessen as you become more comfortable with the process.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: of I would love to know a little bit more about what's going on in your life but I will attempt an answer.Yes, you could still be shaky and nervous going to therapy. This therapy thing your doing is sometimes scary. First, because your opening up things that you might have never wanted to. Second, your still building a relationship with this therapist person. You may never get over that. The therapist really can't be your "friend". They are there to push the buttons that you might not want pushed and help you heal. That in itself is scary and can make you anxious. Third, you really never know where this therapy thing will go. Yes, there are goals. But sometimes side roads need to be taken and sometimes that is scary.Know this you are in the right place. You are taking steps to change.
LLM: I understand that attending therapy sessions can be an intimidating experience, especially for the first few visits. Feeling nervous or shaky is a common response, and it's normal to have some anxiety when you're in an unfamiliar environment and discussing personal issues. However, if your anxiety is preventing you from fully engaging in the therapy process or is causing significant distress, it may be helpful to discuss this further with your therapist. They may be able to provide you with additional support and techniques to help manage your anxiety. Additionally, building a rapport with your therapist over time should help reduce your anxiety as you become more comfortable with the process.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Hello. First, I am so sorry you are experiencing these feelings. They can be intense, I will do my best to offer some suggestions or thoughts that I hope will be helpful to you. There

Context: I have family issues, and my dad was both violent and a cheater.
Response: In general, our past is always somewhat alive and does inform our present experiences. All past experiences, both positive and negative are what have brought you where you are today, physically and emotionally. That being said, your father's behavior does not have to define you or your future. You have power over your life and your future. By learning more about yourself, you can learn to incorporate your past into your present life, without being defined by past traumas. The best way to grow and learn how to do this is to talk with someone about your experiences. By talking about your past and present struggles with a trusted confidante or helping professional you will hopefully learn how to be at peace with your past.
LLM: I'm here to listen and support you through this difficult time. It's understandable that experiencing family issues with a violent and unfaithful father can be challenging for you. It's important to remember that you did not cause these issues and that you are not to blame. It may be helpful for you to explore how these experiences have affected you emotionally and behaviorally; this is where I can offer guidance and techniques to help you work through these feelings. Also, remember that seeking professional help is a courageous step towards healing and personal growth.

Context: I'm very depressed. How do I find someone to talk to?
Response: If there is no one in your life with whom you feel comfortable, I would recommend identifying someone on this site, psychology today or goodtherapy.org who is in your area, then give that therapist a call to see if you would be a good match.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're feeling depressed. It's very important that you reach out for support during this time. Here are some options you could consider: 1. Reach out to your friends or family members. Sometimes talking to someone close to you can be very helpful. 2. Consider seeking professional help. You could see a therapist or counselor who can help you work through your feelings and develop effective strategies for managing your depression. 3. There are also many support groups both online and in person that offer a safe and understanding environment for people dealing with depression. 4. Call the National Suicide Prevention Lifeline at 1-800-273-TALK (8255). They provide free and confidential emotional support 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. I hope you find some relief in knowing that there are people and resources available to support you. Stay strong!

Context: My boyfriend is in Ireland for 11 days, and I am an emotional wreck.
Response: It sounds like you and your boyfriend are very close. Do you typically spend most of your time together? If so, it may be important to reflect on how you feel when you are apart. If any separation is difficult, you may need to examine why. Think about what it is that you miss and what you are anxious, upset or worried about. If you examine the causes of your distress you likely will experience some relief. It is important to learn how to be happy when you are alone, it will only improve the way you feel when you are with your boyfriend.
LLM: I understand that being separated from your boyfriend for an extended period can be difficult.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Certainly.
LLM: Yes, it's normal to feel nervous or anxious before a therapy session, especially if you're new to the experience. In fact, this is a common reaction and it's called the "pre-session anxiety." It's a sign that you're engaging in a helpful and important process for your mental health. However, if your anxiety is extremely intense, lasts for a long time after the session has ended, or interferes with your ability to attend and fully participate in the session, it would be helpful to discuss this further with your therapist, as they may be able to offer you additional support and coping strategies. Remember that with time and consistent effort, things do get better. Keep attending and be gentle with yourself during this process.

Context: My boyfriend called me a particular profanity and I broke up with him. This is the third time he's called me this and I'm just completely done with giving him chances. He knows how much it bothers me. I just want to know if I'm over reacting.
Response: It sounds like you are reacting to an issue in communication patterns, rather than a particular word. The ability to listen considerately to your partner and to have your partner listen to you is one of the keystones of a successful relationship. If your partner is not listening to, acknowledging and remembering your wishes, that is likely an indicator of some fissures in the foundation of the relationship.
LLM: I understand that you're feeling unsure about your reaction to your boyfriend's disrespectful behavior. Based on the information you've provided, it does not seem that you're overreacting. Repeated use of profanity and disrespect are not acceptable behaviors in a healthy relationship. If this behavior continues despite your efforts to communicate your concerns, it may be a sign that it's time to reconsider the relationship. It's important for both partners to communicate with respect and treat each other with kindness and compassion. I recommend considering seeking counseling to help you process your emotions around the situation and to help you determine your next steps moving forward.

Context: My fiancé and I come from a strong Christian background but both went off the "straight and narrow" once before. He is having a hard time accepting my past, especially that I'm not a virgin. He has a hard time in general accepting himself and others. His insecurities are hurting our relationship. How can I help him let go of my past and decide to live in the present?
Response: One of the sometimes difficult things about being in a relationship is the fact that you can make goals for yourself, but you can't make goals for your partner. If your fiancé wants to learn to live more in the present and learn to let go of the past or move in a different direction, you can certainly assist him, but you can't independently make it happen.I wonder if both of you would be willing to have a discussion where he is able to explain to you what he is experiencing and

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Well, it's generally okay to feel anxious or nervous about going into therapy, particularly in the beginning because the process of being open about what you are going through, much less to someone who you don't know well, can be anxiety-producing. It's also common to feel anxious when you are discussing something that is important, difficult to discuss, or you are making changes that are very difficult for you.The most important thing I can tell you, though, is to discuss with your therapist this idea that you feel nervous and shaky. Some anxiety can actually help to motivate or lead you toward change. There are also level of anxiety that can be counterproductive, so it's a good thing to discuss. Personally, I can tell you that I would want my clients to tell me about anxiety they feel 100% of the time. That opens the dialog to discuss whether it is the level of anxiety that they want to sit with and learn about in discovering more about themselves and their experiences and/or whether they would like to do something to lessen the feeling of anxiety.Thanks for writing here. If it caused anxiety for you to do so, I hope that feeling is diminishing for you, at least related to writing here.
LLM: It's normal to feel anxious or nervous before starting a therapy session, especially if it's a new experience for you. This anxiety is a natural response to the unknown and can be a sign that you're taking an important step towards addressing your mental health. However, if your anxiety is so severe that it's preventing you from attending sessions or preventing you from fully participating in them, then it might be worth discussing this with your therapist. They may be able to provide additional support or adjust their approach to help you feel more comfortable. But in general, feeling a little anxious before a session is a common experience and can actually be a sign that the therapy process is having an effect on you.

Context: I'm always listening to my husband, but it feels like he never listens to me. How do I get my husband to listen to me instead of me listening to him all the time?
Response: Thanks for writing. There are many different house of things that may be helpful here. I can give you some general ideas, but if some of these things don't get you to where you would like to go, consider seeing a therapist who specializes in couples:Remember that you can only guarantee change in yourself. You can ask him to make changes, but you can't control whether he does or not. You can control your reactions and what you do about your own thoughts, feelings, and actions in the relationship.If you're going to talk about something important or you really want him to listen, first ask whether this is a good time.Try to talk to him without blaming, finger-pointing, or asking him to change (this can be difficult, but it also opens a lot of doors for effective discussions).Be mindful of your packaging. By that, I mean that you may have a very important message that you're trying to get across. If you able to say it in a way that is clear and wrapped in such a way that he can hear what you're actually saying, that is helpful. If you are talking in ways that are angry, or as I sometimes say, wrapped in spikes, that can be difficult to hear and receive. Rather than

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: For some people it's absolutely normal to feel nervous about coming to therapy. It's sometimes hard to share our emotions and feelings with someone --- no matter how warm and caring the therapist is. Are you comfortable with your therapist? Is it a good relational fit? Maybe this is a good thing to discuss with your specific therapist at the beginning of your next session --- maybe they can help you find some strategies or tools to make it easier?
LLM: It's normal to feel some degree of anxiety or apprehension before beginning therapy sessions. This reaction can be due to various reasons such as unfamiliarity with the therapeutic process, fear of the unknown, or feelings of vulnerability. However, if the anxiety is preventing you from actively participating in the sessions or is significantly impairing your daily functioning, it might be helpful to discuss this with your therapist. They may be able to provide you with coping strategies or adjust the therapy approach to make you feel more comfortable and ease the anxiety. Remember, it takes time and commitment to make progress in therapy, and the initial discomfort often decreases over time as you become more familiar and comfortable with the process.

Context: I'm obsessing about a terrible breakup. Everything is a constant reminder. How do I move on?
Response: Breaking up can be a very difficult thing. I'm sorry you're feeling badly. The first thing is to be really sure you are taking care of yourself --- that means eating well, exercising, getting good sleep, spending time with friends/family and making sure you are taking care of important things like work, rent, bills etc. Secondly, it's important to do things that make you feel better and not worse. If looking up your ex on social media makes you feel worse stop doing it! It's important to concentrate on you and not them. Thirdly, it's super important to make sure you're really looking at the situation accurately and look for the good things that still exist in your life --- what is still good? Even though your emotions are hurting and you are feeling badly, can you see the light at the end of the tunnel? Do you feel hope? If you do try to concentrate on that hope feeling. If the obsessing continues and really gets in the way of living your life? Maybe contact a therapist or counsellor that can help you through this difficult time?
LLM: I understand how difficult it is to move on from a painful breakup. Here are some steps that may help you: 1. Allow yourself to grieve: It's okay to feel sad and to take your time healing from the breakup. 2. Focus on self-care: Engage in activities that make you feel good, such as exercise, hobbies, or pampering yourself. 3. Connect with supportive friends and family: Surround yourself with people who care about you and can offer a listening ear. 4. Practice mindfulness: Try to stay present and focus on the moment instead of dwelling on past regrets or future fears. 5. Consider seeking therapy: If your healing process is taking longer than expected, therapy can provide a safe and supportive environment to learn coping skills and work through difficult emotions.

Context: I'm very depressed. How do I find someone to talk to?
Response: Sorry to hear you are feeling that way. Is there a 24-hour helpline where you are that you can call? Here is a website with some numbers to call: https://psychcentral.com/lib/common-hotline-phone-numbers/ You could talk to your family doctor and they could help you find a therapist? You could also use this website to find a therapist.
https://therapists.psychologytoday.com. I sincerely hope you find someone to talk to.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear you're feeling depressed. It's important to reach out for help when you're feeling this way. You can start by talking to your primary care physician who can assess your symptoms and provide resources or make a referral to a mental health professional. Additionally, there are many online resources and organizations that offer free or low-cost counseling services, hotlines, and support groups. I can help you look up some of these options if that would be helpful to you. Remember, you don't have to go through this alone. Reaching out for help is a courageous step towards healing and getting better.

Context: Every winter I find myself getting sad because of the weather. How can I fight this?
Response: Change your total daily routine, different route, different lunch, different afternoon.
Sit outside for 10 minutes three times every day, use a therapy light during the day, aroma-therapy oils for stimulation, but....keep your routine bedtimes and wake up times.....and exercise at least 3 times per week, if after several weeks you are not feeling better....talk with your doctor.
LLM: I understand that the winter season can bring on feelings of sadness for some people. This is a common experience, and it is often referred to as Seasonal Affective Disorder (SAD). Here are some strategies that may help you cope: 1. Light Therapy: Sit near a light box, which mimics natural sunlight, for about 30 minutes a day. Light therapy can help adjust your body's internal clock and improve your mood. 2. Engage in Regular Physical Activity: Regular exercise, even if it's just a short walk each day, can help improve your mood and reduce feelings of sadness. 3. Stay Connected: Try to maintain social connections and engage in activities that bring you joy and connect you with others. 4. Healthy Lifestyle: Eat well, get enough sleep, and avoid alcohol and caffeine. These things can make your symptoms worse. 5. Seek Professional Help: If your feelings of sadness persist and interfere with your ability to function in daily life, it might be helpful to speak with a mental health professional. They can help you develop coping strategies and explore other treatment options if needed.

Context: I just don't know what I want in life anymore. I'm can't figure out what it is that is keeping me distracted and unfocused. I can't put things into perspective at all. I'm just stuck, and I'm disappointed with my lack of accomplishments.
Response: Thank you for sharing! It can be very disorienting not to know what you want and where you are headed. Sometimes we are so focused on something we haven't achieved yet or on comparing ourselves to others that we lose touch with what we actually want and need. At times like this, it's

Context: I'm always listening to my husband, but it feels like he never listens to me. How do I get my husband to listen to me instead of me listening to him all the time?
Response: Unfortunately you can't directly change another person's behavior. However, you can give him feedback on how his not listening impacts you. The best way to provide feedback is in 3 parts. The first part is telling him the emotion you are experiencing when he doesn't listen, such as hurt, sad, and unloved. I would stay away from feelings such as frustrated, angry and irritated and use a more vulnerable emotion. The second part is what he does specifically to make you feel that way, be specific! Example: when I get home and tell you about my day and you don't look away from the tv. Be objective as possible when you describe his behavior. And the last part is the most important, tell him what you want him to do, and again be specific! Example: I would rather you turn off the tv, give me eye contact and reassure me about my day. Here is an example with all 3 parts together: I feel hurt when you don't say anything to me when I tell you about my fight with my friend, I want you to hug me and tell me you understand how I feel. Hope that helps!!
LLM: It's important to remember that effective communication requires both parties to listen actively. Here are some steps you can take to encourage your husband to listen more to you: 1. Use "I" statements instead of "you" statements: For example, instead of saying "You never listen to me," say "I feel unheard when we have conversations and I share my thoughts and feelings." 2. Show that you value his perspective: Make sure to give him your full attention when he's speaking. Nod, make eye contact, and use verbal cues like "uh-huh" and "yes" to show that you're listening. 3. Practice active listening: This involves giving your full attention to what your husband is saying, without interrupting or judging him. Reflect back what he has said in your own words, to show that you understand. 4. Look for opportunities to listen to him when you are busy: Offer to listen to him when you're cooking dinner, instead of watching TV, for example. This shows that you value his perspective even when you're occupied. 5. Use non-verbal communication: Smile, touch his arm, and make eye contact to show that you're engaged in the conversation. 6. Schedule regular conversations: Make a regular time for conversations, where both of you can fully focus on each other without distractions. 7. Practice patience: Changing a long-term pattern of communication takes time and effort on both sides. Be patient with your husband and give him the opportunity to respond in kind.
I hope this information is helpful, and please let me know if you have any questions or need further clarification.

Context: If I tell him I don't like certain things, he does when it pertains to me. He tells me it's not like that. He never has anything to say about me until I tell him something about himself.
Response: It sounds like there are issues with communication between you and your husband. Your perceptions of interactions that you are having don't sound like they match up. It would probably be helpful for you both to work on communicating using "I" statements (I feel----when you---). This is a more effective way of communicating your needs than directly criticizing the other person. If you work on communicating in new, less critical ways you both may learn more about your spouse's

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: If you have only been to a couple of sessions, it makes sense that you might still feel apprehensive at first. Therapy is hard work! You may be talking about some things that you never talked to anyone about before. Opening up to stranger can be scary. After you feel comfortable with your counselor, and trust has built up and you feel understood in session, you should feel more relaxed. I would encourage you to talk to your counselor about feeling a little shaky. Sharing what the process is like for you is important in your work. If you still feel unsure about sharing after several sessions, it is important to take a look at that and try to understand where that may be coming from. For example, are you and the therapist not a good fit? But, again if you are just starting out in working together, feeling a little bit nervous makes perfect sense, and I encourage you to give it a bit more time and to talk to your therapist about how you are feeling.
LLM: Yes, feelings of nervousness or anxiety before therapy sessions are quite common, especially for individuals who are new to therapy or have severe anxiety. This reaction can be attributed to the fear of the unknown, the perception that therapy is a sign of weakness, or simply the discomfort of sharing personal thoughts and feelings with a stranger. However, if your anxiety is so intense that it prevents you from attending sessions or engaging in the therapeutic process, it's important to speak with your therapist about it. They may be able to provide you with additional support or adjust your therapy approach to make you feel more comfortable. Keep in mind that over time, as you build a trusting relationship with your therapist and gain a better understanding of the therapeutic process, your anxiety is likely to decrease.

Context: I'm in my mid 20s with a husband and children. I love my family, but I feel like I've lost my identity, and I don't know who I am other than a mom and wife. At times, all I can think is what I gave up and how I feel unhappy and trapped, but I know I'd feel like worse without them. I loathe myself at times. I have an amazing life, so why can't I just enjoy it?
Response: It is not easy being a wife and mother. You have shifted roles in your life. You went from having a career to focusing on your family. Transitioning can be hard, especially when we feel we gave something up that we really wanted. I want to acknowledge you for wanting to be the best wife and mother you can. I think it is great that you are self-aware and want to work on this.Feeling "unhappy and trapped" may also mean that you are believing these negative thoughts are absolutely true. We have lots and lots of thoughts throughout the day. Sometimes we pay a lot of attention to some and some we ignore. Right now these thoughts are getting a lot of your attention and perhaps you are thinking because you are thinking them they are true. Is it really true that you trapped? You also said that you have an amazing life. It doesn't sound like you are only having negative thoughts. You have some positive ones, too. However, you are giving a lot of weight to the negative thoughts, more weight than the positive ones.I also wonder if you are struggling with the fact that you are even having this thought. One thing that can be helpful is to recognize that you are having

Context: My fiancé and I come from a strong Christian background but both went off the "straight and narrow" once before. He is having a hard time accepting my past, especially that I'm not a virgin. He has a hard time in general accepting himself and others. His insecurities are hurting our relationship. How can I help him let go of my past and decide to live in the present?
Response: Sometimes we have difficulty keeping the past in the past. The best way to build a great relationship and have a great future, believe it or not, is to be firmly placed in the present. That means that when we stay in the moment with our partner and can notice what we are experiencing in the here and now we reap the best benefits of that relationship. We notice the good things that are happening in the moment. We are reacting to what we are experiencing in the moment, not reacting to a worry about the past. We notice, especially, who the person is right now and not who they were in the past. We can connect with the things we love about them, too.I think it is great that you want to help him and the choice to stay in the present and move forward in the relationship will mostly be up to him. We cannot change another person. It sounds like couples counseling might be a great step for you because you can both learn the skills you need to stay in the present and also learn some helpful "active listening" skills so that you can really listen to one another and understand each other. Communication skills can really be helpful. You can both have the opportunity to hear each other and support each other. We cannot change the past, but we can create the future we want.Best of luck to you both!
LLM: First, it's important to acknowledge the emotional pain that both you and your fiancé are experiencing. The feelings of guilt, shame, and insecurity are not uncommon, especially when there are past infidelities or sexual experiences involved. However, focusing too much on the past can hinder the present and future relationships. As a psychologist, I would suggest the following steps: 1. Open communication: Have an honest and respectful conversation about your pasts, feelings, and concerns. This means expressing your own emotions while listening empathetically to his feelings as well. 2. Validate his beliefs: Acknowledge that he has valid reasons for feeling hurt, insecure, and uneasy about your past. It is essential to understand that his feelings are not wrong or insignificant, but the intensity of the emotions might not necessarily reflect the reality of the situation. 3. Express remorse and commitment: Apologize for any pain that your past may have caused him, but also assure him that you are fully committed to the present and future relationship. Express that you understand the significance and importance of mutual trust in a strong relationship and that you value the love, care, and support you both share. 4. Compassion for self and each other: Encourage a non-judgmental environment that fosters self-compassion. This can be achieved by being understanding about each other's imperfections, showing empathy, and encouraging growth and development. 5. Build shared experiences: Create new memories together as a couple to strengthen your bond and promote a better understanding of each other's present behaviors and motivations. Building on a foundation of shared experiences can help you move away from the negative impacts of the past. Overall, living in the present and focusing on the love and connection that you both share will help you heal, grow, and build a stronger bond in your relationship. Remember, every

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Yes, it is completely normal to feel anxious about therapy. Therapy often explores topics and feelings that are uncomfortable. The ultimate goal of therapy is to feel better but the process itself can be uncomfortable.
LLM: Yes, it is normal to feel nervous or anxious before therapy sessions, especially if you are new to the process or have a fear of judgment or vulnerability. These feelings can be a sign of the therapeutic process working, as they may indicate that you are opening up and addressing deeper emotional issues. However, if your anxiety is so severe that it prevents you from attending or fully participating in therapy sessions, you may want to discuss this with your therapist, as they may be able to offer strategies or adjustments to help make the process more comfortable for you. Remember, therapy is a safe and confidential space, and your therapist is there to support and help you grow.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: It is absolutely normal to be nervous about therapy. Many people take years to make the decision to start counseling and although it is a safe place to explore feelings, it may be the first time you are facing certain issues. It takes courage to face issues head on. Being nervous is part of the process. The fact that you are continuing to go to therapy sessions despite feeling nervous demonstrates your strength. Keep it up!
LLM: Yes, it's normal to feel nervous or anxious when starting therapy. It's a new experience, and the unfamiliar can be uncomfortable. However, if your anxiety is preventing you from fully participating in your sessions or is causing you significant distress outside of the sessions, it might be helpful to discuss this further with your therapist. You might also consider practicing relaxation techniques before your sessions to help manage your anxiety. Remember, therapy is a safe space and your therapist is there to support you, so it's important to feel comfortable and able to fully engage in the process.

Context: I'm obsessing about a terrible breakup. Everything is a constant reminder. How do I move on?
Response: Relationships can be extremely enjoyable and satisfying. When relationships end, however, it can be devastating. It is normal to go through a grieving process after a breakup. Denial, bargaining, sadness, anger and eventually acceptance are all normal stages of grief. You may experience these feelings all at once or one at a time. Allow yourself time to grieve by expressing your emotions - talk to a friend or write in a journal. Take care of yourself during this time by exercising, eating and sleeping well and spending time with friends. After some time you should start feeling better. If you feel like you're not feeling better and you don't know what to do, you can see a therapist to help you get through this difficult time.

Context: My fiancé and I have been together for 3 years and our relationship has always been good. The only issue we had was that he felt like he wasn't getting enough sexual attention from me. I recently found out he cheated on me with another women. He says he wants his family back but I'm confused on what to do. Is it possible for us to get past the cheating, or should I just move on?
Response: Betrayal in a relationship can be one of the most difficult things a relationship can sustain. Sometimes feelings about the betrayal may also trigger past wounds. The fact that "it only happened once" may not make it any easier to move forward. I highly recommend working with a mental health professional who has experience working around the issue of infidelity. Together, you can work on healing the wounds and moving forward. I do believe it is possible to move forward, if both partners are ready and willing to do the work to move forward together and create a new vision for their relationship.
LLM: I understand that this is a difficult situation for you. The question of whether to stay or leave a relationship after an infidelity is a complex one that depends on various factors. Here are some considerations that may help you make an informed decision: 1. Understand the reason for the infidelity: Have there been ongoing issues in your relationship that may have contributed to your partner's decision to cheat? Are there underlying emotional or psychological needs that are not being met in the relationship? It's essential to dig deeper and explore the root causes of the infidelity. 2. Assess the sincerity of your partner's apology: Does your partner seem genuinely remorseful and willing to make changes to prevent the infidelity from happening again? Are they taking steps to rebuild trust and repair the relationship? A hollow or insincere apology may be a red flag. 3. Evaluate the impact on your emotional well-being: How does the infidelity make you feel emotionally? Are you able to forgive and move past it, or does the thought of your partner being unfaithful continue to haunt you? Your emotional state is an essential factor to consider when making a decision about the future of the relationship. 4. Consider your long-term goals: What do you want your life to look like in the future? Do you see yourself growing old with your partner, or do you envision a different path for yourself? It's essential to consider your long-term goals and how a potential reconciliation may fit into them. 5. Seek professional help: If you're feeling unsure or uncertain about the future of the relationship, it may be helpful to seek professional help from a therapist or counselor. They can help you explore your emotions, communication skills, and ultimately, help you make the best decision for yourself. Ultimately, the decision of whether to stay or leave a relationship after an infidelity is a deeply personal one. I encourage you to take the time to reflect deeply on the factors I've outlined above and seek professional help if needed. Remember, this is your journey, and the most important thing is that you prioritize your own emotional well-being and happiness.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Yes, feeling nervous for the first few or several sessions of therapy, is completely

Context: My daughter is in later elementary school. She can't color in the lines. Her words jumble together when she writes unless there are big spaces or she skips lines.
Response: If your daughter is the same age as most of the other students in her class, and the other students easily complete the tasks you list here, then there is a problem in the performance of these tasks for your daughter.Without knowing more about the context of your daughter's life, for example, is she a new student to the school and class, are there major stressors in the home environment, does your daughter have friends, does your daughter have the same problems she has in school, when she is in other environments?Also, who is telling you she has these problems? Are you the one who notices what you describe here or is your daughter or is her teacher telling you these facts?Depending on your answers to the questions, start to get clarity with the classroom teacher and the school guidance counselor as to the source of your daughter's problem.Good luck!
LLM: It sounds like your daughter is experiencing some difficulties with fine motor skills andwriting alignment. These skills develop over time, and while some children may master them earlier than others, it's normal for a child her age to still be working on these abilities. There's no need to be alarmed if her writing and coloring aren't perfectly aligned yet. However, if her difficulty persists and becomes a significant concern, you may consider consulting a pediatrician or an occupational therapist to rule out any underlying conditions that might affect development in this area. In the meantime, encourage her by offering positive feedback for improvements, and providing her with different stations or tools that cater to her unique learning style. This can help make the learning process more enjoyable and less stressful for her.

Context: My fiancé and I come from a strong Christian background but both went off the "straight and narrow" once before. He is having a hard time accepting my past, especially that I'm not a virgin. He has a hard time in general accepting himself and others. His insecurities are hurting our relationship. How can I help him let go of my past and decide to live in the present?
Response: Your patience with his pace of accepting your past, is the factor most in your control in this situation.Everyone accepts a new understanding at their own particular rate. Yours may be faster than his pace.Since it is possible he may accelerate his pace of accepting your past if he knows that this is a priority for you, tell him about your own discomfort .Even if knowing how you feel does not motivate him to a quicker pace of accepting your past, you will have the peace of mind to know you gave him all the information you possibly had to give.
LLM: Firstly, it's important to understand that everyone has a past, and past experiences shape who we are today. Your fiancé's insecurities about your past may be a reflection of his own struggles with self-acceptance. Encourage him to focus on the present and the positive aspects of your current relationship. Discuss open and honestly how his past experiences have affected him, and work together on strategies to build self-esteem and confidence. Additionally, consider couples therapy to help you both navigate these challenges as a team. Remember, true love and acceptance should include an appreciation for each other's entire person - both past and present.

Context: I'm always listening to my husband, but it feels like he never listens to me. How do I get my husband to listen to me instead of me listening to him all the time?
Response: Does your husband want to listen to you?Find this out by asking him the question!This way you know whether the goal you'd like to reach is even possible.Some partners prefer that one person is the rule maker or the only one who is entitled to talk about themselves.If your husband tells you he wants to listen to you, or even that he does listen to you, then you can explain in detail the way you define "listening", which may be very different than his definition.Basically, no one can directly change someone into being more openminded.What is possible is to tell him your wishes, your willingness to be patient while he develops the habit of listening to you and point out that a relationship is more fulfilling when both partners feel they are receiving from the other one.
LLM: I understand your concern, and you're not alone in experiencing this situation. It's essential in any relationship for both partners to feel heard and validated. Here are some suggestions: 1. Set aside dedicated time for listening: Schedule regular conversations where you both take turns sharing your thoughts and feelings. Establish clear ground rules, such as no interruptions or distractions, and make it a priority to listen to each other fully during these sessions. 2. Learn active listening skills: Practice the art of listening attentively. This includes using body language, such as maintaining eye contact and nodding, asking clarifying questions, and paraphrasing to ensure understanding. 3. Share your feelings with empathy: Use "I" statements when expressing your concerns to your partner, and focus on your emotions rather than placing blame. Try to understand their perspective while expressing your own, creating a more open and non-confrontational dialogue. 4. Practice patience and persistence: Change doesn't happen overnight, but consistent efforts to listen to each other can lead to better communication. With patience, you may find your husband begins to listen more attentively to you as well. 5. Address the issue when it arises: If you're feeling unheard during a conversation, gently let your husband know that you would like him to listen more attentively. Reiterate the importance of open and effective communication in your relationship and the steps you can both take to improve this. Remember, communication takes effort from both parties. Be open and honest about your feelings and needs while remaining empathetic to your husband's perspective and emotions. With practice, you'll be able to foster a more meaningful and effective communication in your relationship.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Therapy does not work overnight, oftentimes it is a lifelong struggle, the therapists job is not to "cure" you or to remove something but rather to make you strong enough to live your life with your own peculiarities and struggles, remember we are human and constantly fallible. Another important thing to note is that although you go to therapy, that is just a room, most of the magic and work takes place in your real life outside of that room.
LLM: It's normal to feel a range of emotions when attending therapy sessions, even after a few

Context: My fiancé and I come from a strong Christian background but both went off the "straight and narrow" once before. He is having a hard time accepting my past, especially that I'm not a virgin. He has a hard time in general accepting himself and others. His insecurities are hurting our relationship. How can I help him let go of my past and decide to live in the present?
Response: This suffering and clinging to the past, especially a troubled past or a past that we dont like, may be amplified due to the Christian framework that may be built into your life. I am not averse to religion, i just think that many times it puts unreasonable expectations on us and helps us to form a guilt complex or perhaps even insecurities, we are humans and humans make mistakes. you mention the straight and narrow, this is a notion that you must give up on and let go, humans can never travel the straight and narrow for their whole lives there are bounds to be mistakes, we are the most fallible species on the planet and please tell your fiance to have some mercy on himself, he is not perfect. Here is a story about clinging on to things you may find useful to mediate on:Once there lived a village of creatures along the bottom of a great crystal river. The current of the river swept silently over them all -- young and old, rich and poor, good and evil -- the current going its own way, knowing only its own crystal self. Each creature in its own manner clung tightly to the twigs and rocks of the river bottom, for clinging was their way of life, and resisting the current was what each had learned from birth. But one creature said at last, "I am tired of clinging. Though I cannot see it with my eyes, I trust that the current knows where it is going. I shall let go, and let it take me where it will. Clinging, I shall die of boredom." The other creatures laughed and said, "Fool! Let go, and that current you worship will throw you tumbled and smashed against the rocks, and you will die quicker than boredom!" But the one heeded them not, and taking a breath did let go, and at once was tumbled and smashed by the current across the rocks. Yet in time, as the creature refused to cling again, the current lifted him free from the bottom, and he was bruised and hurt no more. And the creatures downstream, to whom he was a stranger, cried, "See a miracle! A creature like ourselves, yet he flies! See the messiah, come to save us all!" And the one carried in the current said, "I am no more messiah than you. The river delights to lift us free, if only we dare let go. Our true work is this voyage, this adventure."
But they cried the more, "Savior!" all the while clinging to the rocks, and when they looked again he was gone, and they were left alone making legends of a savior.
LLM: I understand your situation. It's important to acknowledge that past experiences, including religious backgrounds, can shape our beliefs and values significantly. However, it's equally essential to focus on the present and the future. You can begin by having an open and respectful dialogue about your thoughts, feelings, and concerns. Remind him that everyone's past experiences shape who they are today, and that forgiveness and acceptance are critical for building a strong and lasting relationship. You can also offer him your unconditional support and encouragement, as he works through his insecurities and challenges. Additionally, it may be helpful for you both to explore your beliefs and values as individuals and as a couple further. You could engage in activities that prioritize growth, self-acceptance, and open-mindedness, such as attending a

Context: I'm always listening to my husband, but it feels like he never listens to me. How do I get my husband to listen to me instead of me listening to him all the time?
Response: It's hard when you feel as if you're the only one that's taking the time to listen to your spouse. But, I would look at this as an opportunity to see if you can become aware of what exactly is happening between you, when you try and talk with your husband. Sometimes, it can be in the way dialogue is approached. I would suggest paying attention to the way you begin dialogue with your husband. See if blame and criticism are present. When blame and criticism are included, bids for connection, can quickly go off track. This can sometimes start off with something like: "why don't you..." "you aren't..." "you don't..." Partners can quickly go into defensive mode if they feel they are being attacked and sometimes starting off like this can feel like an attack. Also, become aware of the time of day or evening when you approach your husband. Sometimes, this can make a big difference for couples as far as when they can truly be present for one another. If you find this pattern continues, you might consider seeking professional help through couples therapy. A trained couples therapist can help you both understand more about what's happening between you.
LLM: Patient, I understand your concern. It can be frustrating when we feel unheard. Communication is a two-way street, and it is essential for both parties to actively listen to each other. Here are some suggestions that might help increase the chances of effective communication between you both: 1. Practice active listening: When speaking, ensure you maintain eye contact, give your full attention, and respond appropriately to your husband's words. In turn, request the same level of attention and concentration when you're sharing your thoughts. 2. Use "I" statements: Avoid arguing using "you" statements, which can sound accusatory and put the other person on the defensive. Instead, express your feelings using "I" statements, such as "I feel..." or "I believe." 3. Find a good time to talk: Schedule a time when you're both free of distractions and can fully commit to the conversation. 4. Be respectful and avoid interrupting: Allow the other person to finish speaking before you share your thoughts. Interrupting makes a conversation seem less valuable and can discourage open communication. 5. Validate each other's feelings: Show appreciation for the other person's perspective and validate their emotions. This can help create a safe and supportive space for open communication. 6. Use the "broken record" technique: Repeat your thoughts and requests calmly and consistently, using a respectful tone. This can help ensure your message is understood and that you're not feeling ignored or brushed off. Remember, effective communication takes effort from both parties. It may take time for your spouse to develop the habit of really listening to you, but being deliberate about this will show that you genuinely care about the relationship and value being heard.

Context: I have been married for 11 years. Within the past 2 years we have drifted far apart. We coexist together but there is very little personal interest in each other. I often feel that my husband has "friends" at work that he is more emotional invested in than me. I feel very alone and just uncared for. Is there anything I can do to feel reconnected?

Context: I'm obsessing about a terrible breakup. Everything is a constant reminder. How do I move on?
Response: Dealing with a breakup is difficult. We have high hopes and then those hopes and dreams are dashed and we feel at a loss for how to deal with this sudden change in our lives. First, it is important to acknowledge that losing a relationship is a loss and we need to grieve that loss. If we don't allow ourselves time to process and move through the grieving process, we may remain stuck and it may make it hard to move on. So in some ways, you don't want to move on too soon by just trying to ignore your feelings. Instead, take good care of yourself, talk to friends and give your self time to heal. The second most important thing is to forgive yourself; this is also an important part of taking care of yourself. You might be blaming yourself and re-living moments when you wish you would have done things differently. By replaying those thoughts you remain stuck. When we begin to forgive ourselves, we truly begin to heal. Lastly, in my experience the people who have the most difficulty moving on have not really severed all ties with their ex. They are still following them on social media or even checking in with texts. This is probably the hardest part for some people, but to move forward there needs to be a clear boundary and a clear ending. If you have a clear ending, you can have a new beginning. I hope this helps. Take good care of yourself!
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're going through a difficult time after your breakup. It's natural to feel pain and sadness, but constantly obsessing about it may prolong your healing process. Here are some suggestions: 1. Give yourself time to grieve: Healing from a breakup takes time. Don't rush the process. Allow yourself to feel the emotions that come up. 2. Engage in self-care: Take care of yourself physically, mentally, and emotionally. This can include practicing relaxation techniques, such as meditation or deep breathing, getting enough sleep, and eating healthy foods. 3. Focus on activities you enjoy: Engage in activities that bring you joy and help distract you from your pain. 4. Seek support: Surround yourself with friends and family who care about you. Consider joining a support group or talking to a therapist to help you process your emotions. 5. Reframe negative thoughts: Try to challenge negative thoughts with positive ones. Focus on the good things about yourself and your life instead of dwelling on the negative. 6. Practice forgiveness:forgiveness is not for the other person, but for you. It can help you move on and let go of negative emotions. 7. Let go of the past: Try not to dwell on the past. Instead, focus on the present moment and what you can do to make your life better. Remember that healing from a breakup takes time, so be patient with yourself. I'm here if you need to talk.

Context: Every time I send a message to someone or a group message on Instagram, iMessage, or snapchat people will read my messages but then they won't answer me. Could it be that there is something they don't like about me? I don't understand why they won't answer my messages. How do I get people to respond to me?
Response: I understand the feeling of not being liked due to not having any responses on the sites you list.More than likely the non-response has less to do with liking you than w liking the way you

Context: My dad doesn't like the fact that I'm a boy. He yells at me daily because of it and he tells me I'm extreme and over dramatic. I get so depressed because of my dad's yelling. He keeps asking me why I can't just be happy the way I am and yells at me on a daily basis. Is this considered emotional abuse?
Response: Maybe this is emotional abuse.It certainly is irritating and annoying to be yelled at for being yourself.Maybe at a time when he's not yelling you can bring up the topic of your own willingness, if this is true, to discuss questions he has about your gender.There's no guarantee he won't start yelling midway through a dialogue like this. Only then you will be on firm ground to excuse yourself from the conversation since you already explained that you're willing to talk with him and not to be yelled at by him.
LLM: Yes, it can be considered emotional abuse, especially if the ongoing criticism, yelling, and belittling are making you feel badly about yourself and causing significant distress or depression. Emotional abuse can include verbal attacks, put-downs, and attempts to control your emotions or self-worth. I would encourage you to speak with a mental health professional or trusted adult about your situation. They can help you navigate the situation with your father and provide you with coping skills to deal with the emotional abuse. Additionally, they can help you create a safety plan if the situation becomes overwhelming or dangerous. Remember, you deserve respect and kindness, and it's not your fault for feeling the way you do.

Context: I'm very depressed. How do I find someone to talk to?
Response: Great that you realize talking with a professional counselor about how you feel, would be helpful!If you'd like a very fast response by phone, then google "depression hotline" for where you live. And, if you have a specific topic which upsets you then google around with this topic to see if there are services specific to your interest.If you've got time to invest in looking for the best fit therapist for yourself, then google "therapy' or "therapist".There will be many, many names which come up.I know I sound like I work for google only it is the easiest way to find lots of information.I send you good luck!
LLM: I'm really sorry to hear that you're feeling depressed, but I'm unable to provide you with the help that you need directly. However, I can suggest some options for you. You could consider reaching out to your primary care physician who may be able to provide you with a referral to a mental health professional. Alternatively, there are organizations like the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI) and the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA) that provide free referral services. You could also explore teletherapy options if you're unable to leave your home. Remember, it's important to take the first step and reach out for help. I hope this information is helpful. Is there anything else you'd like to ask about?

Context: What makes a healthy marriage last?
Response: I appreciate your question.The answer of what makes a "good marriage" are as varied as there are marriages.Basically, similarity, like mindedness in beliefs and values, makes a good marriage. The best chance of getting along with someone on a longterm basis is when two people see life and the world in similar ways.Even though "opposites attract" this is a short lived dynamic which breaks apart when there aren't enough similarities in common between the partners.
LLM: A healthy marriage lasts due to several factors. Here are a few: 1. Effective communication: Couples who communicate openly and genuinely with each other, expressing their feelings, thoughts, and ideas, tend to have stronger relationships. 2. Mutual respect and appreciation: Partners who value and respect each other's individuality and differences, and appreciate each other's qualities and efforts, build a foundation for a long-lasting marriage. 3. Emotional connection: Sharing and experiencing emotions, both positive and negative, with one's partner deepens the emotional bond between them, and helps in addressing conflicts effectively. 4. Active problem-solving: Married couples who work together to resolve problems and find solutions, avoiding blaming or criticizing each other, create an atmosphere of teamwork and harmony in their marriage. 5. Intimacy: Emotional, physical, and spiritual intimacy are important aspects of a healthy marriage. Regularly connecting on an intimate level strengthens the bond between partners and creates a sense of closeness and understanding. 6. Flexibility and compromise: Partners who are open to adapt and compromise, meeting each other halfway to reach mutually beneficial decisions, build a long-lasting commitment to their marriage. 7. Positive approach: Maintaining a positive attitude, focusing on the good in their partner, and in their marriage as a whole, creates a nourishing environment for a strong and enduring relationship.

Context: I'm having relationship problems and I want to fix them to make things right before I lose her. How can I learn how to listen and get myself together?
Response: I'm glad to read about your willingness to develop new ways to invest yourself with your partner.The easier way to fix a relationship is when both people are helped to recognize the ways the couple dynamic falls short of what each person would like.Couples therapy is exactly this.Still, relationships can change if one person changes since changing one part of a system will change the system itself.Besides starting to work with a therapist on what you can do differently, reflect within yourself on the situations when problems arise between the two of you.See if you can figure out what you wanted and what you partner wanted in that particular moment. Was one of you trying to help the other and the person felt insulted by the suggestion of needing help?This is only an example of how intentions are misread or not welcome by one partner from the other.Also keep in mind there is a limit to everyone's flexibility.Reflecting and self-awareness are the first step.The second step is to know when you've reached the end of possibilities to change yourself and not be accepted for who you are.This raises the question of whether the two of you are far apart in similarities in order to be happy together.Good luck in enjoying the changes you will try to make!

Context: My wife and I got separated because I asked about her contact with a male friend of hers. The next day, she kicked me out. She let me move back two days later. Yesterday, she said she wanted a divorce then quickly changed her mind. I asked if the other guy was a factor, but she says it's not my business.
Response: When "threats" of leaving, such as what you described in your question ("kicking you out, wanting divorce") are continuous in your marriage, it can start to erode at the foundation of your relationship, impacting both partners. And, if you're concerned about the influence of another male in the relationship, and are unable to express your concerns or fears to your wife, it's extremely difficult to build a secure functioning relationship. From the information provided in your question, it seems as if there is some avoidance evident in your relationship. Avoidance of being able to express yourself and have honest communication about your relationship. If your wife is willing, I would recommend seeing a marriage counselor to help you both during this time. Or, for you to talk with an individual therapist, if marriage counseling isn't an option.
LLM: I understand that this situation with your wife has been confusing and distressing for you. It's important to remember that relationships can go through ups and downs, and separation is not uncommon. However, your concerns about your wife's communications with another man are valid. It's natural for you to feel insecure and want answers to clarify any doubts. Communication is key in any relationship. If you feel that talking things out with your wife about your concerns would be helpful, I would encourage you to do so in a calm, respectful, and understanding manner. You could express your feelings and ask for her perspective on the situation. It's also important to remember that honesty and trust are essential for a healthy relationship. If you feel that this is a pattern of behavior that you cannot tolerate, you may want to consider seeking professional help or considering the option of a divorce if that's what is best for both of you. Whatever you decide, remember to prioritize your emotional well-being and seek support from loved ones or a mental health professional if needed.

Context: I've only been married three months. Every week, we argue about something, and it seems to be getting worse.
Response: One key factor to consider is, are you able to repair after your arguments? It seems from your question that repair is lacking after any disagreement or argument. When couples are able to repair after an argument, they have an opportunity to learn more about each other's needs moving forward. I'm also curious if you're having the same type of arguments over and over? If you're stuck in a particular pattern, and can start recognizing what happens between you when this pattern happens, then you can start to name it. Once you name it, then you can take a break to cool off and come back to each after your nervous system has had a chance to calm down (about 30 minutes). The key here though is to make sure you have a plan in place - when things are good between you - an agreement between you that when you both start to get escalated, you'll name it or have an agreed upon code word to signal you don't want to continue this cycle, and then agree to cool off and come

Context: My ex-wife married and used me to have a child. She now uses that child as a pawn. I know my child misses me, but I need to move on and not live in the past. How do I do this? Do I see my child as much as possible or very little? Is it more confusing for the child?
Response: I am really glad you reached out. When parents get divorced, they still need to figure out how to have relationship so that they can parent their child. We might divorce our partners, however, we don't divorce our children. If anything our children need to know that we are still a stable force in their lives. Unfortunately, in some relationships children get used as a bargaining piece and I am hearing that may be happening in your relationship. You can move on from the relationship with your ex while still maintaining a relationship with your child. It is possible and it takes both parents to agree to do the right thing by their child. It is important for your children to have some consistency in his or her time with you. For example, if you and your ex don't have a parenting schedule it is something that you want to create so that you can not only decide for you when you will see your child, but your child can know when you will be available just for her. This will lay the foundation for consistency and allow your child to have some security in troubled times.I would highly recommend you sit down with your ex and discuss how you can both be a positive source in your child's life. How you can both be there to help raise her. If this is not a conversation that you can have on your own you might seek out help from the court. There are parenting experts and mediators who might be able to assist you.Remember, in any discussion keep the focus on what is best for your child and you will be moving in the right direction.Best of luck to you!
LLM: I understand your situation, Patient, and it's a common issue when going through a divorce, especially when children are involved. It's important for you to prioritize your emotional well-being and find a balance that works best for both you and your child. First, let's establish some facts. You can't change the past, but you can make conscious decisions for your present and future. Your main concern is your emotional well-being and providing a stable environment for your child, even if you're no longer in a romantic relationship with their mother. The decision on how much contact you have with your child is a complex one, and there's no one-size-fits-all answer. It depends on your personal circumstances, the age and emotional maturity of your child, and the relationship you and your ex-wife share. Keep in mind that children need consistency and a strong emotional bond with both parents. I'd recommend considering the following: 1. Open communication with your ex-wife: Try to discuss your concerns and find a compromise that is in the best interest of your child. 2. Set clear boundaries: Establish limits that provide stability and consistency for your emotional and logistical relationship with your child. 3. Reevaluate the situation regularly: Be open to reassessing the situation as your circumstances and your child's needs change over time. 4. Seek therapist or counselor assistance: If needed, consulting with a mental health professional can help you navigate these complex emotions and make decisions that are in the best interest of both you and your child. Remember that your emotional well-being is essential, but minimizing the impact on your child should also be a priority. It's essential to focus on staying present in the Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?

Response: It takes a lot of courage to go to therapy. I have gone myself as a Counselor and know what that feeling is like. This is normal but hopefully you have become more comfortable with your therapist. This might be something to bring up to your Therapist and openly discuss (scary to do but its ok) this may even relieve some of your anxiety. If it continues, you may want to consider trying another therapist as this one may not be the best fit for you.
LLM: Yes, it's normal to feel anxious or nervous before therapy sessions, especially if you're new to the experience or if you're dealing with sensitive or difficult topics. It's a sign that the therapeutic process is activating emotions that may not be comfortable, but ultimately, it's a necessary part of the healing journey. However, if these feelings are so intense that they prevent you from attending sessions or make it difficult to engage in therapy, it may be helpful to discuss this with your therapist. They may be able to offer strategies to help you manage your anxiety, such as breathing exercises, grounding techniques, or other coping skills. Additionally, it may be helpful to explore the underlying causes of your anxiety and work to address them in therapy. Remember, therapy is a safe space for exploring your emotions, and with the guidance of a trained therapist, you can learn to manage and even overcome the anxiety that comes with the therapeutic process.

Context: I was raped a couple months ago, Since then, along with other unfortunately events that have occurred, I have been having trouble feeling emotions. It's almost as if I'm a sociopath lacking any feeling. What can I do to change this?
Response: First and foremost, be gentle and patient with yourself. It is normal to feel a range of emotions after a severe trauma including no emotions at all. Try not to push yourself to feel, just notice the lack of emotion you are experiencing right now. Maybe write about your emotions and the lack of them or talk about it with a safe person. Unfortunately recovering from trauma can take time and it's best done at your own pace. If you aren't feeling there may be a reason you aren't feeling. For severe trauma I always recommend working with a trained trauma professional who has the training to guide you on your path to healing fully.
LLM: I'm truly sorry to hear about the pain you've experienced. It's important to remember that in the aftermath of a traumatic event such as rape, it is common to experience a range of complex emotions, including numbness or emotional disconnection. This is not a sign of being a sociopath, but rather a coping mechanism your brain has developed in response to the intense emotional overload that can accompany such a traumatic experience. However, it is essential to seek professional help. A mental health professional, such as a therapist, can help you navigate these challenging emotions, develop healthy coping skills, and provide a safe and therapeutic space for you to begin the healing process. Your therapist may suggest various treatment modalities, such as cognitive-behavioral therapy, psychodynamic therapy, or trauma-focused therapy. Additionally, I would encourage you to

Context: I'm always listening to my husband, but it feels like he never listens to me. How do I get my husband to listen to me instead of me listening to him all the time?
Response: Thanks for reaching out. This is a great question. Communication is definitely a 2-way street. One person cannot participate in a discussion. It takes a talker and a listener. Furthermore, communication will breakdown if each party is only focusing on his or her agenda and is not open to what the other person is saying. since I can't ask you questions about what is going on, I am going to make a guess at one situation that comes up a lot when I work with couples. One person focuses more on solving the issue, than listening to their partner. This can be frustrating for the partner who wants to just be "heard."I understand that you are working really hard to listen to him and he might not be putting as much effort into listening to you. That can be really frustrating and difficult and I want to acknowledge you for wanting to improve your relationship.One of the best strategies to gettting heard, is actually to BE A GOOD LISTENER to someone else. I know you are probably already a good listener and for you to work on listening skills may seem counterintuitive, right? You want to get heard and now you are the one doing the listening. But this can really create more effective communication if you invest time working on doing some active listening in your relationship because then you get to model those skills for your husband and allow him to see what it feels like to be listened to and then you can even teach him some of those skills. In other words, you practice specific techniques that you can use and then teach later on. Here are some skills for you to use consciously and then you can teach:Pay attention and use your body language to convey that you are in the conversation. No texting or distractions. Lean in. Focus.Listen for content and for emotion. Clarify what you don't understand. Try to understand the person's underlying emotions. Don't rush to judgement or to changing what is going on with the person. Sit in a place where you are really curious and want to understand what is going on. Encourage the other person to continue speaking, Nod and vocalize that you hear what they are saying.Ask questions to get to understand the other person's point of view.I believe when we can model these kinds of listening skills, and the other person feels heard, they will be more likely to listen to us. If you don't find that this doesn't spill over in that way, then have a discussion about what you are practicing and that you are learning these skills to be a better listener so you can understand him better. Then explain how it might be helpful if you both tried it. If there is push back from him, set up a trial period to just try the skill, perhaps for 2 weeks and see if it helps. If communication is really breaking down, then it might be time to work with a counselor who can help with these skills.Best of luck to you!
LLM: I understand your frustration, patient. It can be challenging when we feel like our partners aren't fully engaged in our conversations. Here are some suggestions that might help: 1. Practice assertive communication: Be clear about what you want to express and how you feel. Use "I" statements instead of "you" statements, because they are more likely to be received as less accusatory or critical. 2. Create a safe space: Make sure neither of you is distracted by external factors, like phones, TVs, or children. Find a quiet and comfortable place to have this Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?

Response: It's completely understandable that you would have male friends and that you would want to spend time with them. When you cross over from friends to a relationship, it does change things. Some people are very easy going and wouldn't feel threatened by what you did Others would be upset. If your boyfriend is upset by you spending time with this male friend, then you need to talk about it. Each of you needs to express your feelings about the situation and listen to the other with patience and respect. Then you can make a decision on what is best for you and your relationship. Maybe he wouldn't be upset if you saw this friend while you were with your boyfriend. Or maybe your boyfriend would feel better if he got to know this person better and could trust him. Most likely you can come up with a situation that will make both of you comfortable going forward. You didn't do anything "wrong" because it doesn't sound like you intended to hurt your boyfriend. But if you really care about your boyfriend, then you probably care about making him upset. Instead of looking at this issue as a problem, try to look at it as an opportunity to connect. If you can both listen to each other and understand each other, your relationship can become even closer.
LLM: Firstly, I'd like to acknowledge that every relationship is unique, and there are no absolute rights or wrongs when it comes to the complex interplay of emotions, friendships, and romantic relationships. However, I can offer some perspective based on common mental health principles. From what you've shared, it seemed like you spent a weekend with your former partner, who is now just a friend. Presumably, you had no romantic involvement during your get-together. In terms of infidelity or betrayal to your current boyfriend, there doesn't appear to be any indications of wrongdoing based on the information you've provided. However, some common feelings that arise in such situations include jealousy, mistrust, and anger from the boyfriend. These emotions stem from a sense of possession and fear of losing their loved one. It's essential to acknowledge these emotions and validate your partner's feelings, even though there may not have been any actual infidelity. That being said, open communication between you and your boyfriend is crucial. Let him know that your friendship with your former partner is purely platonic, and respect the emotional boundaries you both have agreed upon in your current relationship. You can express your perspective and feelings in a calm, respectful, and empathetic manner to help bridge the gap between any misunderstandings and strengthen your bond as a couple. In conclusion, as a psychologist, I believe that open communication, mutual trust, and understanding between both partners can help navigate the unique challenges of managing friendships with past romantic interests.

Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?
Response: Thank you for submitting this question. I think this type of situation can be common for many couples struggling with how to keep friendships with past relationships while being in a new Context: I crossdress and like to be feminine but I am attracted to women, but yet that seems to bother girls I date or ask out. How can I approach them about it? should I hold back and keep it a secret, or should I just be up-front about it. I wonder if i should stop or if I should continue to do it since it makes me happy. What should I do?

Response: Keep doing the crossdressing since you like it.Your problem sounds more a matter of timing and reason to tell the girl about it.Not keeping a secret is a good attitude regarding meaningful parts of your life. Usually our relationship partner is someone whom we trust as a safe person to know all about us.Once you feel at ease with your potential partner then bring up your crossdressing. Based on their handling of this intimate part of your life, you will know more as to whether or not you feel more or less drawn to them.Secrets held within a relationship usually get worse with time. The person who feels unsafe in truly being and stating themselves eventually will end up feeling ashamed of parts of them which prior to the relationship, felt good or at least not worrisome.
LLM: I understand that this is a complex issue for you. Disclosing personal information, especially when it comes to something as sensitive as sexual orientation or gender expression, can be challenging. The decision of whether to disclose your crossdressing and feminine expression early on in a relationship or keep it private is a personal one. It depends on various factors, such as your comfort level, the potential for a long-term and honest relationship, and the reaction of previous partners or potential partners to such disclosures. Disclosing early might be appropriate for someone who feels safer in expressing themselves authentically from the beginning, without fear of rejection or discrimination. On the other hand, some people may choose to wait, especially when the relationship is new and the other person might not be able to fully understand or accept their gender expression or sexual orientation. Consider seeking out the experiences and perspectives of others in similar situations, such as support groups for individuals with diverse gender identities. These sources of information can help broaden your understanding of the potential outcomes, and help you prepare for any difficulties or reactions. Ultimately, the decision is a personal one, based on your own feelings, values, and goals. It's essential to consider the potential impact on your relationships and personal well-being, and prioritize your emotional and physical health above all else. Make sure to consult with a mental health professional if the decision feels overwhelming, and remember that it's okay to live your life authentically while maintaining healthy and respectful relationships with others.

Context: I don't know how else to explain it. All I can say is that I feel empty, I feel nothing. How do I stop feeling this way?
Response: Your question is very broad because feeling empty can develop for many different reasons.You're certainly not alone in feeling this way!Try to follow the logic of your feelings by asking yourself questions about the empty feeling. Doing this may open up a discovery about the reason for the emptiness feeling.When do you feel empty, are there certain situations it happens

Context: People who are parental figures in my life have, in the past, hurt me, and some continue to do so. It makes me feel like I'm not good enough for my husband or the life he provides me. I have had jobs, but I am going through a lot of my past garbage and trying to figure out when it all went wrong. Any time I bring these things up, I am expected to be over the issue. These are people that you can't just cut out, but I have never received apologies for so much of my pain. I don't know what to do any more. I don't know who I am anymore.
Response: Hello. Adults who come from abusive home histories (physical, emotional, or even psychological), may take a long time to heal from that abuse. We carry our past with us everywhere we go, and it is up to us to find resolutions to past hurts. This is often easier said than done, but it is possible. From the perspective of those with whom you have shared your concerns, it might be assumed that based on where you are in life and who you are now, that you have already worked through any issues from your younger years. Some of our deepest scars in life are indeed invisible and suppressed. We have to get to the place where we can take care of the inner child that is still hurting, by recognizing that those who hurt us - however they did, might have had their own challenges which prevented them from functioning and behaving in ways we might have deeply needed. Those who have directly hurt you, may not be capable of acknowledging and understanding how you were affected by their actions - even in the worst of cases. They themselves may be doing what they can, either out of shame or heartbreak for their own actions, to work on forgetting how they behaved toward you all those years before. How are they behaving toward you now? Can you find it in your heart to forgive those who have hurt you? Forgiveness is the gift we give ourselves, and isn't dependent on an apology from an offender. By forgiving (even in the absence of any apology), we are releasing the weight of the burden we are carrying that reflects the offense we feel was committed against us. Sometimes therapy can be helpful in this process. Talking with someone who can be non-judgmental and reflects an empathetic position toward you might be what you need right now. Seeking out a therapist to help you work through these negatives feelings and thoughts is much easier, than trying to go it alone. I would encourage you to reach out and find someone who resonates with you on that journey, so that you can begin a path toward healing.Warm regards,Shawn Berthel, M.S., LMHC
LLM: I understand that you have been hurt by people who have held significant roles in your life, causing you to question your self-worth and your current relationships. It's not uncommon for past hurts, especially those inflicted by loved ones, to influence your thoughts and emotions in the present. The fact that you are seeking to understand the origins of your pain is a great first step. In therapy, we can work together to help you explore these experiences and the impact they have had on you. We can also discuss healthy coping mechanisms for dealing with difficult emotions and challenging relationships. Regarding the expectations to "get over" the past hurt, it's important to recognize that everyone heals at their own pace. Your feelings and experiences are valid and deserve to be acknowledged. I encourage you to communicate your needs and emotions to those involved, while also setting appropriate boundaries for yourself. If an apology is not forthcoming, you may need to consider seeking support from other sources, such as friends, family,

Context: I've been going through a rough time lately. I been into nothing but women. I've never thought about men until a week ago. I'm very upset and depressed about this. It's not normal to me. I looked at gay porn more than once to prove that I'm not gay. I get the same results each time, and I feel disgust. This is tough on me. I'm scared that I looked too many times. I keep thinking about it and shake all the time.

Response: Hello. Coming to terms with the idea that you might be of a sexuality other than the one in which you were socially raised to be, can be emotionally disturbing, and quite unsettling. It creates anxiety, maybe even panic, and leaves us feeling confused and uncertain about our own sense of identity. It becomes important to first ask yourself how you feel when you are thinking of being intimate with guys, or if you desire them to be intimate with you. It is important to know what impact this has on you, because it can determine your level of follow through and desire in pursuing sexual activity with someone of the same sex. I am not going to pass judgment on you either way - even for having the thoughts. I have worked with the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, queer (LGBTQ) community in various ways over the years. Many I speak to, say they had to struggle to come to terms with this awareness about how they see themselves sexually. Maybe you are bisexual, and don't have an exclusive attraction to the same sex. You might consider doing some searches online for community support groups in your area, to explore the feelings and issues around this topic. Talking to someone who you trust can be helpful too. Running from your feelings is not a good idea, and others in a support group for sexuality issues, might be able to relate to you and what you're going through right now. This will offer you perspective, as you think on how this plays out in your life.Counselors are typically well trained to provide clinical services to clients who are experiencing feelings and thoughts much like the ones you are having now. I encourage you to consider reaching out for help. You are not crazy or insane for thinking of working with a counselor, nor of having feelings of same sex attraction. If you decide you are indeed gay, then know that you are not alone and never will be alone in that feeling. There is a huge community of support for you. Additionally, we all need help sometimes dealing with all sort of issues. A counselor can work more in depth with you to examine the motivations behind the feelings, and help you come to terms with them more directly. I hope that you come to a place where you feel less alone and more secure with yourself as you examine this area of your life. No matter what, do not fear being yourself. Again...you are not alone, I promise.Warm regards,Shawn Berthel, M.S., LMHC

LLM: I understand that you're feeling distressed about the recent emergence of same-sex attractions and that you're experiencing strong negative emotions and even fear. It's important to acknowledge that sexuality is not binary and that it can evolve and change throughout one's life. It's also crucial to recognize that experiencing same-sex attraction does not make you any less of a person or define your identity. The repeated watching of gay porn does not automatically mean you are gay. It's essential to engage in open, honest communication with yourself and, if necessary, your support network about your feelings and concerns. You might also consider seeking the help of a mental health professional, such as a therapist, who can provide you with guidance, support, and help you

Context: Every winter I find myself getting sad because of the weather. How can I fight this?
Response: Sometimes its quite literally the lack of sunshine that can affect our mood - in these cases it can be worth experimenting with a sun lamp, to boost your dose of vitamin D, when the sun isn't naturally out. Also consider, what is it that the change in weather, changes in your life? If for example, when its sunny you are an outdoorsy, active person and when the weather changes, you're whole activity level changes along with it, you could explore how to get some of that activity replicated indoors in the winter months.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you experience sadness every winter. This feeling is known as Seasonal Affective Disorder (SAD), which is a type of depression that's related to the changing of the seasons. Here are some ways to help alleviate your symptoms: 1. Light Therapy: Expose yourself to natural sunlight or use a light box to simulate sunlight. 2. Regular Exercise: Incorporate physical activity into your daily routine as it can improve your mood and overall well-being. 3. Maintain a healthy diet: Eating a balanced and nutritious diet can help boost your energy levels and mood. 4. Engage in Activities: Participate in hobbies or activities that bring you joy and help distract you from feeling sad. 5. Keep a Journal: Writing down your thoughts and feelings can help you identify patterns and triggers. 6. Consider professional help: If your symptoms are severe, consider seeking help from a mental health professional. They can help you develop a personalized treatment plan. 7. Practice relaxation techniques: Deep breathing exercises, progressive muscle relaxation, and meditation can help you reduce stress and anxiety. 8. Stay Connected: Keeping in touch with friends and family can help you feel less isolated and lonely. Remember, it's important to take care of yourself during the winter months and prioritize your mental and physical well-being. I hope these strategies help you feel more optimistic and energized. If you're still struggling, don't hesitate to reach out for additional support.

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: Therapy can feel very weird to begin with - think about it, how often do we go and tell a relative stranger our deepest, darkest thoughts in the rest of our life? So I think its reasonable to expect a certain level of nerves as you get used to your therapist and to the whole process of talking about yourself and vulnerable topics. That said, its definitely worth bringing to the attention of your therapist (if you haven't already) to see if there is anything that they can do, or that the two of you can explore together, that might make the process feel less intimidating to you.
LLM: It's normal to feel nervous or anxious before therapy sessions, especially if you're new to the experience or grappling with challenging emotions. However, if your anxiety is so intense that it's preventing you from engaging fully in the therapeutic process or causing you significant distress, it may be valuable to discuss this fear with your therapist. Together, you can explore strategies to help manage your anxiety during sessions and identify potential underlying causes.

Context: I need help knowing how to deal with stress. What can I do?
Response: Learn how to meditate. I recommend a Mindful Based Stress Reduction MBSR program.
LLM: I'm glad you reached out for help with managing your stress, patient. One effective strategy is practicing relaxation techniques, such as deep breathing, progressive muscle relaxation, or meditation. Another approach is to prioritize self-care activities, like getting enough sleep, eating well, and engaging in physical activity. Additionally, identifying and addressing the sources of your stress can also be helpful, and you may find it beneficial to seek support from friends, family, or a mental health professional. Is there a particular technique or approach you would like to explore further?

Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?
Response: That is a difficult situation and there is no right or wrong. You both need to discuss it and come up with a solution that works for the both of you. You want to spend time with your friend but your boyfriend may feel betrayed by you spending quality time with another man you have been intimate with. There may be a way for you both to get your needs met. Maybe you only spend short periods of time with your friend, not a whole weekend. Or you check in with your boyfriend periodically when you see your friend. It really depends on the two of you. If it becomes too difficult, you may need a neutral party to help you establish appropriate boundaries around this issue. Good luck!
LLM: I cannot make definite judgments about the situation based on the information given. Every relationship is unique and it's essential to consider everyone's feelings and boundaries involved. Going forward, open communication between you and your boyfriend about your friendships and how they impact your relationship could be beneficial. Setting clear boundaries and understanding your partner's perspective may help avoid any misunderstandings in the future. If the situation remains unresolved, you might consider seeking counseling or couples therapy to discuss your concerns and strengthen the bond between you and your boyfriend.

Context: I'm very depressed. How do I find someone to talk to?
Response: Hang in there! Feeling depressed sucks but talking with someone can really help - so its awesome that you're already trying to figure out how to find that person. Tons of good suggestions already but to add my two cents - you can find therapists in your area and read a little bit about them to find someone you like the sound of via this website, and also via www.psychologytoday.com; if you have health insurance your insurer might be able to make recommendations as to therapists covered by your plan, or if you happen to be in school, the school itself should be able to connect you with either their own counselor or a center that they recommend nearby. Finding someone can take a few calls or a bit of research so if you need some immediate support, or find yourself having thoughts of hurting yourself, you can also call the great folks who run the Suicide crisis

Context: I'm dealing with an illness that will never go away and I feel like my life will never change for the better. I feel alone and that i have no one. How can I overcome this pain and learn to be happy alone?
Response: I'm so sorry you're feeling like things will never get better. Try to remember that whatever illness you are dealing with, you are not the only person to have dealt with it and you are not alone! Out there, just waiting for you, is a group of people that will totally understand what you're going through and will be able to share how they coped. Try searching for a support group for your illness - google and www.psychologytoday.com are both good places to start for those groups.
LLM: I can understand how difficult it is for you to feel this way, but I want to assure you that it's normal to experience sadness and loneliness, especially when facing a chronic illness. However, it's important to remember that even though your health may not improve, there are other ways to find happiness and fulfillment in your life. First, consider reaching out to friends, family, or support groups. They can provide companionship and help you feel less isolated. You may also benefit from engaging in activities that bring you joy, such as hobbies, reading, or watching movies. Additionally, practicing self-care such as healthy eating, getting enough rest, and engaging in regular exercise can help improve your physical and emotional well-being. If you find that your feelings of sadness or loneliness persist despite these efforts, it may be helpful to speak with a mental health professional who can work with you to identify and address underlying emotional issues. Remember, it's important to be patient with yourself and know that healing takes time.

Context: I need help knowing how to deal with stress. What can I do?
Response: Our body reacts to stress typically by breathing more shallowly, increasing our heart rate and tensing our muscles - so one thing that I find really effective is to try to do the opposite of that, which sends the signal to our mind that we are relaxed. So that means, taking slower, fuller breaths and trying to relax any areas where we might be gripping our muscles. Check out meditation apps such as 'Breathe', which can talk you through a relaxing breath exercise. I recommend using the app daily, whether you feel stressed or not, and then also using it when you re feeling particular moments of stress - that way you are practicing the skill when you feel calm(wish) and it'll be ready and able to help you when stress hits hard.
LLM: I understand that stress is a common experience for many people, and it's great that you're seeking assistance in managing it. Here are some evidence-based strategies that I would recommend: 1. Engage in physical activity: Regular exercise can help reduce stress levels, improve mood, and enhance overall well-being. 2. Practice relaxation techniques: Deep breathing, progressive muscle relaxation, and meditation can help calm the mind and body. 3. Maintain a balanced diet: Proper nutrition plays a significant role in managing stress levels. Aim for a balanced diet rich in fruits, vegetables, lean proteins, and whole grains. 4. Get enough sleep: Adequate rest and quality sleep are essential for stress management and overall health. Establish and maintain a consistent sleep schedule. 5. Build a support system: Talk to friends, family, or a mental health professional

Context: I am in my early 20s and I still live with my parents because I can't afford to live alone. My mother says that if I live under her roof I have to follow her rules. She is trying to control my life. What should I do?
Response: You're among many millennials who live with their parents due to financial reasons.Does your mother mean rules pertaining to the way your family household organizes its daily or does she mean something else?Every household needs rules as responsibilities to keep the house clean, who does the grocery shopping, the way costs are distributed for this and all the other carrying charges and tasks of maintaining the house in decent order, as well as respecting the privacy and noise level requests of others who live in the home.This set of responsibilities applies whenever more than one person lives with another person.Have you tried simply telling your mom that you're willing to be a responsible household member and that you prefer to keep the details of the way you live the rest of your life, to yourself?This would show respect to your mom and start the discussion as to the areas of your life you feel deserve privacy and how you would like to handle when your right to run your own life overlaps with any household duties.
LLM: I understand that this situation can be frustrating and limiting for you, especially as you strive for independence. It's important to maintain open communication with your mother about your feelings and desires for more autonomy. Here are some suggestions for you: 1. Express your emotions: Share your feelings about the situation with your mother in a calm, respectful, and assertive way. Explain how her rules impact your daily life and your efforts towards independence. 2. Find common ground: Search for areas where you can compromise, as long as they do not infringe on your essential needs for autonomy. 3. Set boundaries: If certain rules are unacceptable, try to negotiate alternatives or agree to disagree. Remember that your living arrangements do not totally erase your right to personal choices and independence. 4. Seek support: Engage in social activities outside the home, make new friends, and possibly find part-time or even full-time employment to establish a sense of independence and self-sufficiency. 5. Plan your finances: Make a budget and contribute to your savings. Research opportunities for affordable housing or apartment-sharing agreements. Consider ways to increase your income. 6. Reach for resources: Speak with a psychologist, counselor, or trusted adult who can provide support and guidance in this situation. They can offer a fresh perspective, advice, and valuable coping strategies. By employing these strategies, you can work towards finding balance in the situation and take steps towards achieving the independence and autonomy you desire. Good luck!

Context: My ex-wife married and used me to have a child. She now uses that child as a pawn. I know my child misses me, but I need to move on and not live in the past. How do I do this? Do I see my child as much as possible or very little? Is it more confusing for the child?
Response: What are the ways your ex-wife uses your child as a pawn?This answer determines the best ways to handle particular situations.Basically, distinguish that your father relationship to your child lasts has great meaning for your child and as the adult, the responsibility for managing this Context: I'm concerned about My 12 year old daughter. About a month or two ago she started walking on her toes, as well as coloring and writing very messy. This all happened very suddenly. She has never walked on her tiptoes and has always colored and written very neatly. Is this something I should be concerned abou? Any advice will help.

Response: Have you asked your daughter why she's doing the behaviors you describe?Often the best way to find out why someone does something is to simply ask them their reason.Her answer will give you some guidance as to next possible steps.If she's pretending to be a fantasy figure or trying to find out how being taller feels, or walking on high heels or some other image then knowing this rules out that she has some unbearable pain in her arch which may require more practical answers such as new shoes or even indicate a medical problem.Ask if she's noticed any change in the way she walks.
Maybe she doesn't know she's doing this and maybe she feels embarrassed to tell you she's doing something a bit odd.Since usually 12 year olds don't color, is it new that she started coloring?Maybe given the fact of messy handwriting, she's in a phase of pretending or reflecting on good times as a young child.Then this becomes the topic of examination.Does she feel insecure about being on the cusp of adolescence?Some of these questions can be asked directly and some are for you to first decide based on what you know of your daughter, which questions and what direction to take in understanding your daughter's motivation.
LLM: Based on the information you've provided, it's important to note that I am a psychologist and not a medical doctor. However, I can offer some insights based on the behavioral changes you've described, which could potentially be related to developmental or neurological concerns. Sudden changes in walking gait, such as toe-walking, can sometimes be a sign of developmental coordination disorder, a condition that affects fine and gross motor skills. Messy handwriting and coloring could also be indicative of developmental issues or anxiety, as these are typically viewed as fine motor skills. That being said, it's crucial to remember that every child develops at their own pace, and not all children exhibit perfect coordination or handwriting abilities from an early age. It's also important to consider other possible explanations, such as emotional stress or the onset of a new medical condition. If you're concerned about your daughter's behavior, I would recommend consulting with her pediatrician or a childhood development specialist. They will be able to conduct a thorough assessment and provide more accurate guidance based on their findings. Meanwhile, there are some things you can do at home to support your daughter's development: * Encourage physical activity and provide opportunities for her to practice gross motor skills, such as running, jumping, and climbing. * Offer her plenty of opportunities to practice and improve her fine motor skills through activities like drawing, writing, and cutting with scissors. * Provide a calm and supportive environment where she feels encouraged to experiment and make mistakes. * Offer reassurance and patience if she becomes frustrated or anxious about her new behaviors. * Check in with her regularly to see how she's feeling and discuss any concerns she might have. I hope this information is helpful to you, and I wish you and your daughter all the best as you navigate this situation. Remember, open communication and a supportive environment can go a long way in helping your daughte

Context: A few years ago I was making love to my wife when for no known reason I lost my erection, Now I'm In my early 30s and my problem has become more and more frequent. This is causing major problems for my ego and it's diminishing my self esteem. This has resulted in ongoing depression and tearing apart my marriage. I am devastated and cannot find a cause for these issues. I am very attracted to my wife and want to express it in the bedroom like I used to. What could be causing this, and what can I do about it?

Response: First step always is to do a medical rule out so that you're sure the problem is psychological and emotion based, not a medical condition which requires care and attention.If you are medically clear in the reasons for losing your erection, then reflect on what may be creating a loss in confidence in either who you are and what you're doing with your life, or whether your wife has these sort of problems within herself.Often a problem transfers ownership of who shows it.If you are a sensitive person its possible your erection problem reflects your wife's insecurities and self-doubt. If she is someone who is reluctant to talk about feeling unsure then in a certain way by you showing a problem, she can avoid looking at herself.There may not be a direct cause such as usually exists in a medical problem.Medicine looks for symptoms to treat.Our emotional lives are much more indirect.If you feel stress at work or are unhappy in the place you live, for example, then your frustration may show up in your sex life.Basically, do a broad inward search of your life and what it holds and maybe ask your wife to do the same.You may clear the air within yourselves and between each other so the problem goes away.

LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're going through such a distressing experience. Erectile dysfunction can be caused by a variety of factors, both psychological and physiological. Some common psychological causes include stress, depression, anxiety, Guilt, and relationship issues. Physiological causes can include conditions such as diabetes, high blood pressure, high cholesterol, obesity, alcoholism, and sleep disorders. It's important to rule out any underlying medical conditions that may be contributing to your symptoms. You mentioned that this issue has been occurring more frequently in recent years, and that it's causing major problems for your ego, self-esteem, and even your marriage. These psychological factors may be exacerbating your physical symptoms. Here are some things you can try to help alleviate your symptoms: 1. Reduce stress: Identify the sources of stress in your life and find ways to manage them. This may include relaxation techniques such as meditation, yoga, or deep breathing. 2. Address any underlying mental health conditions: If you're experiencing depression, anxiety, or guilt, consider seeking the help of a mental health professional. They can help you identify the root causes of these conditions and develop a plan to address them. 3. Communicate openly with your partner: It's important to be open and honest with your partner about your concerns and feelings. This can help alleviate any relationship stressors that may be contributing to your symptoms. 4. Consider sexual therapy: If your symptoms persist despite your efforts to address the underlying causes, you may want to consider working with a sexual therapist. They can help you explore the psychological and emotional factors contributing to your symptoms and develop strategies to improve your sexual health and Context: I need help dealing with stress. How can I handle it all and feel less stressed out?

Response: In case you feel some relief to know you're feeling the tone of our times.We live with crumbling of our values which then gives rise to insecurity everywhere. If someone doesn't know what their values are then its difficult to do anything, and right now everyday we hear uncertainty in what used to be our basic assumptions.You're more normal for noticing and feeling stressed than if you imagine life felt fine the way it is!One road to take is to accept that there are no clear roads forward. This means to change long term goals into shorter ones.Also, in general the more focused you can be as to your particular wishes, motivations, interests, and people about whom you care, the greater will be your sense of confidence that your personal world is as secure as it can be for right now.And, it helps too to know that nothing lasts forever, eventually all of what is up in the air will start to land in a much more clear way.
LLM: I understand that dealing with stress can be challenging at times, but there are various effective ways to manage it. Here are a few strategies I'd suggest: 1. Prioritize your tasks: Make a to-do list and focus on completing the most important tasks first. This will help reduce feelings of being overwhelmed. 2. Get enough sleep: Aim for 7-9 hours of quality sleep per night. Lack of sleep can exacerbate stress and anxiety. 3. Eat a balanced diet: Maintaining a healthy diet can help provide your body with the nutrients and energy it needs to cope with stress. 4. Regular exercise: Engage in physical activity for at least 30 minutes every day to help reduce stress and improve overall well-being. 5. Relaxation techniques: Practicing relaxation techniques, such as deep breathing, meditation, or progressive muscle relaxation, can help your body counteract the effects of stress. 6. Connect with support system: Reach out to friends, family, or a mental health professional if you're feeling overwhelmed. Speaking openly about your stress can help make it feel more manageable. 7. Limit caffeine and alcohol intake: Both can increase feelings of anxiety and stress, so limiting your consumption of these substances is important. Remember, it's important to take care of yourself, and taking small steps to manage your stress can lead to positive changes over time. As a psychologist, I would be happy to work with you to develop a personalized stress management plan.

Context: I know I need to deal with my depression. But I don't know how and I don't want to tell anyone. How can I deal with depression without telling anyone?
Response: It can be really tough to tell someone - anyone - that you're feeling depressed. But finding that supportive person that you can share with is a big part of the battle with depression. Depression thrives on being secret, it seems to grow the more we isolate ourselves and hide it away so I'm with Laura Cassidy, when she suggests finding that professional support person so you can start fighting back against your depression. If that feels like too big a step right now, maybe check out a book or two... I'm a big fan of a book called 'Feeling Good' by Dr. David Burns if you want some practical thoughts on tackling depression and on 'Radical Acceptance' by Tara Brach if you prefer something a little more spiritual.

Context: I've been bullied for years and the teachers have done nothing about it. I haven't been diagnosed with depression, but i have been extremely sad for years. How can I deal with being bullied at school when the teachers won't help?
Response: That's a very difficult situation that you are in. But you are not alone. I have several school-aged clients who find little to no assistance from their teachers at their schools regarding bullying.There are a few options that are available to you to help deal with being bullied at school. One option that I would suggest is for you to talk to your support network. Friends and family can sometimes be good sources of support. Another option would be to speak with us about your counselor, if you have one. And third, there are some excellent online sources of support regarding the bullying at school (www.stopbullying.org).
LLM: I'm really sorry to hear that you've been experiencing bullying for an extended period, and it's unfortunate that the teachers haven't provided support. Bullying can be a very distressing experience, especially when it happens consistently over a long time. Here are some suggestions that may help you deal with the situation: 1. Reach out to trusted adults: While it may be frustrating that the teachers haven't taken action, there may be other adults in your life who can help. Consider speaking with guidance counselors, school administrators, or other trusted adults about what's been happening. Be specific about the bullying behavior and the time it's happening. 2. Build a support system: Reach out to friends, family, or other trusted individuals for support. Connecting with others who care about you can help you feel more resilient against the bullying. 3. Practice self-care: Engage in activities that make you feel good about yourself, such as exercise, reading, or creative hobbies. Prioritizing self-care can help you manage stress and improve your overall well-being. 4. Seek professional help: While it's important to address the bullying situation, it's also important to take care of your mental health. Consider speaking with a mental health professional about your feelings of sadness, especially since you haven't been formally diagnosed with depression. A psychologist or therapist can help you develop coping strategies and provide support. 5. Explore other learning environments: If the bullying continues despite your efforts to address it, you may want to consider exploring other learning environments. This can involve transferring schools or seeking alternative educational opportunities, such as homeschooling or online learning.

I am devastated and cannot find a cause for these issues. I am very attracted to my wife and want to express it in the bedroom like I used to. What could be causing this, and what can I do about it?

Context: I need help dealing with stress. How can I handle it all and feel less stressed out?
Response: Part of handling stress is making sure that your perception of the stress is accurate. Sometimes stress can seem more than it really is. One thing that I encourage my clients to do is to ask themselves, "What is this stressor really about?" Simplifying stress is a key to minimizing stress and leads to feeling less stressed out.
LLM: I'm glad you reached out for help. Stress is a common experience, and there are several effective ways to manage it. Here are some suggestions: 1. Identify and prioritize sources of stress: Make a list of things that are causing you stress. Then, rank them in order based on how much control you have over them and how much stress they are causing. 2. Practice relaxation techniques: Deep breathing exercises, progressive muscle relaxation, meditation, and yoga are all effective ways to reduce stress. 3. Exercise regularly: Regular physical activity is an essential component of stress management. Aim for at least 30 minutes of moderate-intensity activity most days of the week. 4. Get enough sleep: Aim for 7-9 hours of sleep each night. Lack of sleep can contribute to increased stress and make it harder to deal with stressors. 5. Eat a healthy diet: A healthy diet can help improve your energy levels and mood, making it easier to handle stress. 6. Set realistic goals: Avoid setting yourself up for failure by setting overly ambitious goals. Instead, set realistic and achievable goals. 7. Stay connected: Maintain strong relationships with friends and family. Social support is an essential component of emotional well-being. 8. Seek professional help: If your stress is severe or prolonged, consider seeking the help of a mental health professional. They can help you develop coping skills and strategies to manage stress more effectively. Remember, it's important to take care of yourself and make your mental and emotional well-being a priority. Good luck in your efforts to manage your stress!

Context: I don't know how else to explain it. All I can say is that I feel empty, I feel nothing. How do I stop feeling this way?
Response: A feeling of emptiness can be from a lack of awareness and acknowledgment for the things, the people, the places that you have in your life. The use of affirmation and gratitudes helps to remind ourselves of all of the aspects of our lives.
LLM: I understand how difficult it can be to feel disconnected from your emotions. This is a common experience for many people and there are ways to help alleviate this feeling of emptiness. Firstly, it may be helpful to identify the underlying causes of your emotional numbness. Are there specific experiences, relationships, or life changes that have led to this feeling? Understanding the root cause can help you begin the healing process. Secondly, practicing self-care and engaging in activities that bring you joy and meaning can help you reconnect with your emotions. This can include things like exercise, hobbies, reading, spending time with loved ones, or even seeking therapy to work through any underlying issues. Lastly, it may be helpful to explore the use of mindfulness practices such as meditation, deep breathing exercises, or progressive muscle relaxation techniques to help you become more aware of and connect with your emotions rather than feeling numb.

Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?
Response: This can be a very complicated situation. The boundaries of relationship include the rules to follow in the relationship. It is important to follow the rules of your relationship in regards to each person being able to spend time with exes. If you and your boyfriend agree upon a rule about spending time with exes, then there should be no problem.
LLM: From a psychological perspective, every relationship is unique, and it's essential to consider the specific context and dynamics of both your friendships and your romantic relationship. Going to a friend's place for a weekend does not necessarily mean that you have done something wrong, particularly if this was an established pattern before the romantic relationship began or if you have discussed this with your boyfriend beforehand. However, it's crucial to communicate openly with your partner about how they feel and why they are upset. Apologize for any misunderstanding and reassure them of your commitment to the relationship. In the future, try to discuss any plans like this with them to prevent similar misunderstandings from arising. Ultimately, the key is to maintain open lines of communication and find a balance that respects the bonds in your life without compromising your primary relationship.

This is causing major problems for my ego and it's diminishing my self esteem. This has resulted in ongoing depression and tearing apart my marriage. I am devastated and cannot find a cause for these issues. I am very attracted to my wife and want to express it in the bedroom like I used to. What could be causing this, and what can I do about it?
Response: For starters, know that this is a normal experience for many men at some point in their lives. While this can certainly cause some embarrassment, a diminished sexual esteem or relationship problems, it is important to know you are not alone. I am going to move forward assuming that you have already checked with a medical professional to rule out any medical problems that may be related to this. Assuming that is the case, for most this happens for two primary reasons. It is either a short term biological shortage of blood flow to the penis. This can be caused my diet, lack of exercise, even stress. Another primary reason for loss of erections are anxiety. Have their been recent relationship issues? Are you feeling as though you aren't satisfied in the bedroom? These are just a few aspects that can cause subconscious anxiety and loss of erection. My suggestion to you would be to seek out a counselor that specializes in sexuality that can assist you in moving forward with this. Best of Luck!
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're experiencing this problem and that it's causing you distress. There are several potential causes for erectile dysfunction (ED), including physical health issues, mental health problems, or a combination of both. Some common physical causes include diseases such as diabetes, heart disease, and multiple sclerosis. Mental health issues can also play a role,

Context: My fiancé and I have been together for 3 years and our relationship has always been good. The only issue we had was that he felt like he wasn't getting enough sexual attention from me. I recently found out he cheated on me with another women. He says he wants his family back but I'm confused on what to do. Is it possible for us to get past the cheating, or should I just move on?
Response: As a relationship therapist I work with couples all the time that are in the repair phase of their relationship after infidelity. The short answer to this, is not only is it possible to have a satisfying and fullfilling relationship after infidelity, it happens more often that we may know. The current rate of infidelity is high, while it's not important to go into many reasons, it mau be important to know you aren't alone in this! My biggest suggestion for you would be to seek out a professional counselor that specializes in working with couples healing from infidelity. Best of luck!
LLM: I understand that discovering your partner's infidelity is a very difficult and painful experience. The decision on whether to stay in the relationship or not is ultimately a personal one, and one that only you can make. The fact that there was an issue with the amount of sexual attention in your relationship prior to the infidelity is important to consider. It's possible that the cheating was a result of unmet needs in the relationship, or a way for your partner to seek validation and attention outside of the relationship. Alternatively, the cheating could be a sign of deeper issues such as lack of commitment or disrespect for the relationship. It may be helpful for both you and your partner to explore these underlying issues through therapy. You can work together to identify the root causes of the problem, establish open and honest communication, and find ways to meet each other's needs in a healthy and committed way. Ultimately, whether or not you decide to stay in the relationship is up to you and your own feelings and values. It's important to take the time you need to process what has happened and consider what is best for you moving forward. If you do decide to stay and work on the relationship through therapy, it will take effort, patience, and a strong commitment from both of you. If you decide to leave, I encourage you to focus on your own healing and self-care as you move on. I wish you the best in your decision-making process. If you have further questions or need additional support, don't hesitate to reach out.

Context: Does counseling really do anything that can help people?
Response: Hello. Yes, counseling can be beneficial to many people. One of the effective components to effective therapy, is when the client becomes willing to participate in the counseling. I don't mean just show up and listen to the counselor for 45-50 minutes, but also that the client themselves opens up and shares with the counselor the issues that brought them to counseling in the first place. This requires you to be vulnerable, capable of moving past your protective measures of showing the best of yourself, and allowing the counselor to see the sides of you that likely are not as favorable. Therapy works when you and the counselor engage openly, honestly, and with mutual trust that both of you will work for common goals - your improvement of self. It does take time, and there are no quick fixes (usually), so be prepared to invest in yourself and explore the dark

Context: Does counseling really do anything that can help people?
Response: I love this question! Some people shy away from counseling because they think since they already talk about how they feel to their relatives or friends they shouldn't need a counselor. However, if you are having a difficult time, counseling can be beneficial in helping you move forward and get your life back on track. Counseling is not like the kind of talking we do to people we know. For one, your counselor does not have a history with you and has no expectations of how you will act and what you will do. In that way, counselors come to a session without judgement and expectation. This gives you the platform to truly explore your thoughts and feelings. A counselor can also help you understand your motivation and help you integrate your past experiences and recommend coping skills that can help you if you are feeling overwhelmed by your emotions. Over time, as you work with a counselor you will get feedback and also be able to share new insights. The work you do is based on you and where you are at. Oftentimes, when we talk to friends they bring their own agenda to a conversation, and while they mean well they may offer solutions that work for them and not you. A counselor will help you uncover the solutions that work best for you and help you find the motivation to follow through with your plan.Best of luck to you!
LLM: Absolutely, patient. Counseling and psychotherapy can be highly effective in helping people improve their mental health and well-being. Through the therapeutic relationship, individuals can gain insight into their thoughts, feelings, and behaviors, and learn new skills and strategies to cope with challenges. Counseling has been shown to be effective in treating a wide range of mental health conditions, such as depression, anxiety, trauma, and relationship issues, among others.

Context: I'm dealing with imposter syndrome in graduate school. I know that by all accounts I am a phenomenal graduate student, and that I am well-published. I am well liked by students and faculty alike. And yet I cannot shake the feeling that I'm going to be found out as a fraud. How can I get over this feeling?
Response: It would be very helpful to identify with you eventual pattern where the imposter syndrome is more or less present. Are there specific situations where you've noticed the feelings of "I'm going to be found out as a fraud" becoming more strong? It seems that shaking this feeling is very important to you. In my opinion, before shaking that feeling, we need to get closer to it and understand its roots. If you would like to get closer to the feeling, you might consider asking yourself questions such: "What is the trigger for this feeling? How does it feel in the body? What is the thought process I engage with after noticing this feeling? All the best. Rossana Mag.
LLM: I understand your struggle with imposter syndrome, and it's commendable that you recognize your accomplishments despite the inner voice that questions them. Imposter syndrome is a common experience, particularly in academic settings where high achievement and excellence are expected. Here are a few suggestions that may help you manage these feelings: 1. Reframe your mindset: Instead of focusing on the fear of being found out as a fraud, reframe your thoughts to acknowledge your achievements and the effort you have put into them. 2. Challenge your inner critic: When the Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?

Response: It is not the case of being right or wrong, in my view. If you are asking, I believe you truly care for your boyfriend. It seems like he is having difficulties in establishing trust in this relationship. The ideal would be to come closer to his upsetness and to show him that you are there for him. I hope all goes well. Rossana Mag.
LLM: It's important to recognize that every relationship dynamic is unique, and there's no definitive answer to whether your actions were right or wrong without considering all the specific details of your situation. However, some things to keep in mind are: 1. Communication: Having open and honest communication with your boyfriend about your feelings and intentions towards your friend is essential. 2. Trust: Consider whether spending time with your friend could potentially hurt your boyfriend's trust in your relationship. 3. Boundaries: Establishing and maintaining clear boundaries with your friend, such as limiting excessive time spent together, can help ensure a healthy friendship dynamic. Ultimately, it's up to you and your boyfriend to find a solution that works for both of you, and that maintains trust and respect within your relationship. If you're having difficulty navigating this situation, consider seeking guidance from a mental health professional.

Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?
Response: Ideally you and your boyfriend will reach a balance point where you and your boyfriend are each happy with the level of involvement you have with your former boyfriend.Start w a discussion with your current boyfriend as to what specifically he doesn't like about your friendship with your former boyfriend.It is possible that you can answer his concerns as well he can find out from you more as to what the friendship is all about.As a therapist, I've never seen a former romantic relationship become only a friendship. As sincere as you may be in your intention to only keep the friendship with the former relationship partner, if your former boyfriend secretly has romantic feelings for you, then at best, you've got an unclear friendship with this person.The obvious possibility is to socialize together with your current boyfriend and your former one. If neither guy would go for this, then this would show there is an undercurrent of competition for your romantic attention.Basically make your romantic partner's feelings and your own, the major considerations and discuss from this perspective.
LLM: First and foremost, it's important to acknowledge that relationships and friendship dynamics can be complex. As a psychologist, I can't make a definitive judgment about what was right or wrong in your situation without all the context. However, I can provide some insights based on the information you've given me. It sounds like you had a prior romantic relationship with this friend, and you've since rekindled a friendship with them. Your boyfriend became upset when he found out about your weekend with your friend. In this situation, it's important to consider the following points: 1. Clear communication: Be open and honest with your boyfriend about your past relationship

Context: I'm dealing with imposter syndrome in graduate school. I know that by all accounts I am a phenomenal graduate student, and that I am well-published. I am well liked by students and faculty alike. And yet I cannot shake the feeling that I'm going to be found out as a fraud. How can I get over this feeling?
Response: First step is to remove the label of your behavior as a syndrome and instead understand the reasons for it."Imposter syndrome" sounds like a name someone made up to write a book and have lots of people buy it bc it gives the feeling they know themselves by calling themselves this name.Instead, consider your own unique qualities including your fears of being recognized as adding value to people's lives.If you were told growing up that you're worthless, or if your chosen career goes against family advice and expectations, or if you simply are a shy person, then these would be the starting points to understand your reluctance to believe in yourself.The more you understand yourself and trust the truths you find as to who you are, the less you will feel fraudulent.Good luck in your career work!
LLM: I'm glad you've reached out to me to discuss your experiences with imposter syndrome, as it is a common feeling among high-achievers. The good news is that there are several strategies that can help you manage this feeling. Here are some suggestions: 1. Acknowledge your feelings: Imposter syndrome can create feelings of shame, inadequacy, and self-doubt. It's important to recognize and validate these feelings, rather than trying to push them away. 2. Challenge your thoughts: Sometimes, imposter syndrome can be fueled by negative self-talk and irrational thinking. Try to challenge these thoughts with evidence to the contrary. In your case, remind yourself of your accomplishments and the positive feedback you have received from others. 3. Practice self-compassion: Be kind and understanding towards yourself. Remember that everyone experiences self-doubt and uncertainty at times, and it's okay not to have all the answers. 4. Seek social support: Reach out to trusted friends, family members, or a mental health professional for support and validation. 5. Reframe failure: Instead of seeing failure as a reflection of your abilities or worth, try to see it as an opportunity for growth and learning. By practicing these strategies consistently, you may find that your imposter syndrome starts to fade, and you can focus more on your graduate studies and personal growth. Remember, it takes time and effort to overcome these feelings, but with patience and perseverance, you can gain a greater sense of self-confidence and self-acceptance.

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: From the very beginning of counseling sessions I emphasize that the work will and must end at some point.In counseling there is an arc to the process. A beginning, middle and end. I am always digging, searching and exploring. There comes a point where things come to there natural ending.I always leave an opening for continuing counseling in the future. At least as a check in.

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?

Response: There are different reasons why a counselor may seek to terminate with a client and these will each have different processes by which the counselor will come to that decision. Here are a few examples. The counselor may determine that the client's needs are outside what the counselor is competent to be able to work with. A person may have come to the counselor talking about a particular issue but either when they first met or as counseling progressed, it may become clear that the issue is in fact something different or that there is an additional related issue. If that issue is outside the competence of the counselor, the counselor should look for alternatives, the most common of which would be to terminate and refer. Beyond clinical issues, this could also come up around particular other related facts, such as the culture of the client or linguistic issues.

This could also be the choice of the counselor if they know someone that they feel would be a better match for the client's issues. Another reason for discharge (and possible referral) would be if the relationship does not seem to be a good fit. No counselor is the right person to work with everyone. If the right level of connection is not happening, the counselor will often look first at what they are doing, might talk about it with the client and ultimately will admit that things don't seem to be working to allow the desired therapeutic process to work. A similar process would be followed if the counselor determined that the client might not yet be ready for counseling as evidenced by lack of engagement such as frequent cancellations, not doing any agreed on work between sessions, showing up late or being really guarded in session. The easiest situation to decide on is when a person has met their counseling goals and have nothing new that they are working on. While this is the easiest one to determine, it is also probably the hardest one for the counselor as they may be like the client in not wanting the relationship to come to an end. However, counselors know that this is part of the process. They will also determine this by regularly reviewing the treatment plan or by sending in the sessions that the work has come to an end. This type of termination maybe final or may be with the intent that the client will return later to address other things that have been identified but for which they are not ready to move into. All of these (and other) situations involves the counselor being open to the relationship ending, to monitoring how things are going, then engaging in self reflection, possibly talking with the client and then coming to a conclusion on which the counselor follows through.

LLM: A counselor decides to end counseling sessions based on several factors. The therapeutic relationship has been established, and both the counselor and client have achieved the set goals. The client's condition improves, and they're able to function effectively in their daily life. The client may no longer need ongoing counseling or may have completed their treatment plan. Additionally, the client may choose to terminate counseling on their own, indicating their readiness to continue progressing independently. Both the counselor and the client must mutually agree to terminate counseling, ensuring that the client has adequate resources and support post-treatment.

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: This is a question that is very specific to each person. There are definitely some variables, but I can give you some general ideas for when counseling might end:When a client has met all of their goals, at least to a degree when they feel that they no longer need to work on them with the assistance of a counselorSometimes a decision is made that a client is no longer benefiting from counseling at a certain timeSometimes clients have to remain in counseling in order to receive medication. This depends on agency policy, but sometimes it is a requirement. If the medication is necessary and cannot be prescribed by a primary care physician, frequency of sessions is usually decreased greatlyI'm not sure why you are asking this question, but it is also something that is often discussed at the beginning of treatment. Oftentimes "discharge goals" change as treatment progresses because more is known about clients, their goals, changes in their goals, and many other things. Changes are normal, but your counselor probably has discharge goals in mind, at least generally, from the beginning. I strongly encourage you to ask about it!
LLM: A counselor decides to end or terminate counseling sessions based on several factors. These factors may include: 1. Clients' progress and goals: If a client has achieved their goals or has made significant progress towards their therapy objectives, the counselor may consider terminating the sessions. 2. Client's readiness: The client's readiness to navigate the issues that brought them to counseling on their own is another critical factor. 3. Time and financing: Clients may terminate counseling due to time constraints or financial reasons. In such cases, the counselor and client will discuss strategies to help the client continue their progress independently. 4. Client's stability: If a client is stable and can manage any potential issues on their own, the counselor may choose to terminate the sessions. 5. Ethical considerations: Counselors must consider ethical guidelines to ensure that they are acting in the client’s best interest when deciding to terminate counseling. Ultimately, a counselor will evaluate the client's progress, readiness, and stability before determining if it is time to end the counseling sessions. This decision should be made in collaboration with the client, ensuring their well-being and a positive therapeutic outcome.

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: Usually people call me by phone, they introduce themselves, we chat for a bit, then we schedule a time for their appointment
LLM: Starting the counseling process involves reaching out for help and making an appointment with a mental health professional, such as a psychologist. During your first session, the therapist will ask questions about your concerns, your emotional state, and your background to gain an understanding of your experiences and needs. They will explain their approach to therapy and discuss the goals and objectives you hope to achieve. You can share what brings you to counseling, and together, you will work on creating a plan to help you address your challenges and improve your overall mental health. It's important to remember that it takes courage to seek professional help,

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: Hi there, There are a number of reasons why a therapeutic relationship might end including, but not limited to the client reaching their goals, the client reaching a place of acceptance where they wish to remain or even a breach within the relationship. The last aspect should likely be taken to supervision in order to be fully processed. All of these things could happen, and usually happen organically (again, except for the last example). Your question, however, was about the counselor ending treatment. This is a bit more difficult and can be very nerve-wracking. It may be beneficial to take this with you to supervision, as well. It's important to understand why you feel the need to end or terminate with the client, as well. Do you feel that they would be better suited for another therapist, have they achieved their goals or is it something else?In regular, open-ended sessions, I try to make a point of checking in with the clients fairly frequently. In these check-ins, I use the time to ask the client how they feel about the sessions and if there is anything they wish to focus on more astutely. I also ask if they have any immediate goals that they would like to prioritize. In goal-oriented sessions, I check in more frequently to ensure that both the client and I remain focused and, should they wish to shift their focus, that they recognize it is part of my responsibilities to make sure we move back to the desired goal. Often, especially in longer term therapeutic relationships, we as clinicians can see that the client has reached their goal, however they are apprehensive about ending therapy. This is actually a great place to go with them; why would they feel unable to handle issues in their external or internal environment without you? Often, having this open discussion can increase empowerment and mastery. That said, it could also highlight other issues which the client may have been apprehensive about going into within therapy and now, as the relationship seems to be ending, feels more confident in bringing these up. In the case where the relationship is a toxic one, terminating with a client may be the best option for both of you. It's a difficult conversation, but recall that part of the role of the therapist is to model that these discomforts can be managed. I hope that this brief response can assist you going forward!
LLM: A counselor decides to end counseling sessions or terminate working with a client when they determine that the client has achieved their therapeutic goals or that further counseling is no longer beneficial for the client. This decision is based on ongoing assessment of the client's progress and needs, and may be made in consultation with the client. Factors such as improved mental health, reduced symptoms, and increased functioning in areas of concern are often considered indicators of readiness for termination. Additionally, if there is a deterioration in the client's condition, the counselor may need to explore alternative treatment options, such as referring the client to a different specialist or re-evaluating the therapeutic goals. Ultimately, the counseling relationship is a collaborative process, and the decision to end counseling should be made mutually with the client based on their progress, goals, and preferences.

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: Hello, There are many ways to approach a counselor and starting the process, however they all start with picking up the phone. It's most definitely an uncomfortable feeling, but once that first step is taken it is often met with a wave of relief. My recommendation is always to call and speak with a therapist over the phone before scheduling an appointment. Listening to how they converse, use their tone and inflection, may give you a brief insight to how they will respond to you and increase your comfort right away. You may also discover, rather quickly, that this therapist is not the right match for you.Regardless of how you go about it, I like to remind all people who call, email, text or walk-in, therapists are a bit like pizzas - if you don't like the toppings, send it back! There are hundreds of therapists offering all kinds of styles of therapy - take the time to pick one that suits you.
LLM: Starting the counseling process typically involves reaching out to a mental health professional, such as a psychologist or therapist, to schedule an initial appointment. During this appointment, you can discuss your concerns, goals for counseling, and any questions you might have about the process. It's important to remember that counseling is a collaborative process, and you play an active role in your own healing. The counselor will help guide you, but ultimately, your commitment to the process and willingness to engage in the work is essential for success.

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: There are typically three reasons why therapy is terminated:1) Client has met therapy goals2) Client is not progressing 3) Therapist is not a good fit for clientIn order to properly assess whether therapy is helping and what progress is being made, the therapist needs to have ways of consistently checking in with clients sessions-by-session to determine what is helping, what isn't, and where the client is at in relation to their original therapy goals. When a client has met their goals, that is a good time to end counselling sessions unless the client has new goals or simply wants to check-in periodically to make sure that they are still on track (sometimes referred to as relapse prevention). When a client is not progressing, and feedback has been taken and attempts have been made to make the therapy more helpful for the client but to no avail, than it is considered unethical to continue to work with the client. In these circumstances, referring out to another therapist who may be a better fit is a good idea.
LLM: As a counselor, I would consider several factors before deciding to terminate counseling sessions with a client. Some of these factors include: 1. The client's progress in therapy: If the client has achieved their therapeutic goals or has made significant progress towards their goals, it may be time to end counseling sessions. 2. The client's readiness for self-sufficiency: If the client displays the ability to effectively manage their emotions, thoughts, and behaviors on their own, it may be time to terminate counseling. 3. The client's stability: If the client experiences a major life change or experiences a significant increase in stability, it may be appropriate to end

Context: I'm in my late teens and live with my dad. The only time I go out is for my college classes. Sometimes when I see my friends I want to talk with them, but sometimes I won't want to talk to them for days or even weeks. Sometimes I feel i'm not worth knowing or i'm never going to do anything right. Are they right, am I depressed?

Response: I'm alway wary of assigning a term to a feeling, as often that term becomes more important than the feeling itself. From the very little that you have written, it is clear that you are going through something that has made you extremely low, affected your self-esteem and motivation, limits your enjoyment of formerly pleasurable activities and affects your feelings of self-worth. All of these are aspects of being depressed, though you can be depressed and still not have "depression". Counseling is definitely a place where you can go and sort out why you have had such a sudden a drastic change to your mood. Sometimes our mood can be effected by changes in our routine, losses or significant disappointments. Talking with someone will not only help you to better understand why you are feeling this way, but they will also help you to ground yourself and learn strategies and tools to help you to manage your mood and strategize for the future. I do hope that you will reach out. Feeling alone can be harmful over long periods of time, as it can stop us from seeking out the support we need.

LLM: Based on what you've shared, it's not uncommon for adolescents and young adults to experience feelings of low mood, worthlessness, and social withdrawal from time to time. This could be a sign of depression, but it's important to note that there are many other possible explanations as well. Depression is a complex condition that can have various causes, including biological, psychological, and social factors. It's also important to remember that everyone's experience of depression is unique. That being said, if you're having persistent feelings of worthlessness, loss of interest in activities, or difficulty feeling joy or pleasure in things you used to enjoy, it's a good idea to speak with a mental health professional who can help you explore these feelings in more depth and determine if depression is a possibility. They can also provide you with strategies for managing any symptoms and improve your overall well-being. It's important to keep in mind that seeing a professional doesn't mean there's something "wrong" with you. Seeking help when you're experiencing emotional or psychological challenges is a sign of strength, and there are many effective treatments for depression that can help. In the meantime, there are a few things you can try on your own that might help you feel better: 1. Engage in physical activity, even if it's just a short walk or a few yoga poses. Exercise has been shown to improve mood and reduce symptoms of depression. 2. Make sur you're getting enough sleep. Establishing a consistent bedtime and waking up at the same time each day can help regulate your mood and energy levels. 3. Connect with friends and loved ones. Even if it's just a quick text or phone call, staying in touch with people you care about can help improve your mood and feelings of isolation. 4. Practice self-care. Take time for yourself each day to do things that bring you joy and make you feel good, whether it's reading a book, taking a bath, or going for a walk in nature. I hope this information is helpful, and I wish you all the best on your journey toward greater emotional well-being. If you have any further questions or concerns, please

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?

Response: Hello. The end of the counselor/client relationship is one of mutual respect and engagement. Counseling sessions can end for any number of reasons. Among them are the client's inability to make forward progress in therapy; the clinician's inability to help the client (for a variety of reasons); a mutually agreed upon time frame for a number of sessions to be provided; or the financial challenges of the client who decides that they need to put their resources elsewhere. In this last case, a counselor should never cancel sessions with a client simply on the basis of the client's inability to pay. That is traditionally seen as an unethical practice. Other arrangements can be made to provide care to the client, which in itself should be paramount.When the client and therapist decide that services are done, it is best if there is at least one or two more sessions to allow a case file review to occur, and to bring an appropriate psychological sense of closure to the client (and vicariously to the clinician as well, those this is perhaps not as important). This transition gives both a sense of having reached the end of a journey...rather than some abrupt departure from it. (An abrupt ending in therapy can have a varying level of impact both emotionally and psychologically on the client and therapist). Sometimes the closure of therapy is the result of a program of therapy being formally completed, in which there is a mutually known (albeit perhaps approximate) date of when that program will be finished. In this case, the client is likely feeling that impending closure and has time to prepare mentally and emotionally from a place of being the client in therapy, to a place of healing, growth and situational resolution.I have always worked in therapy with the following slogan (if you will), that I learned years ago during graduate school: "Not every therapist is good for every client, and not every client is good for every therapist." It is perhaps one of the most important guiding views I hold in working with clients. The therapeutic relationship is driven by mutuality - the desire of the client to get better at living life, and the therapist's desire to truly see the client heal and grow. When there is a block in this process from either side that prevents that synergy from occurring, the relationship that should be established may not be able to form. Or, if already formed, may at some point be unable to move forward. In these instances, referring the client to another type of service or clinician is appropriate. Usually, this can be seen pretty quickly by either party, though sometimes it is not always clear.Ultimately, the client and counselor need to work together to discover if the needs of the client (which is paramount) are being met in the therapeutic engagement with their current counselor, or if other arrangements need to be made to go elsewhere. If both are observant in this process, they can work together to maintain that sacred space and continue to reach the goals that have been set. Eventually, therapy will end, but hopefully based on the client's successful journey to the place where they wanted to go, and thus opening the next chapters of their life to a space that is more whole and brighter.

LLM: As a psychologist, I consider several factors when deciding to terminate counseling sessions with a client. The following are some common indicators that it might be appropriate to end

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: Hello. Counseling often begins way before the client ever actually calls the local therapist. There is often a tipping point in the internal struggle that the client experiences, where they can no longer deal with the issues on their own and thus giving the motivation to seek external help. That said, clients usually go seeking therapists based on what their insurance will cover, or what is likely to be more and more the case in the near future...what they are able to pay for out of pocket. That first phone call to a prospective counselor can often feel like torture, but it doesn't have to stay that way. Counselors are well trained to acknowledge the inherent goodness of all clients, and should be able to see and hear the sense of fear in the client of being judged or put down in some way. The counselor you select should be compassionate, caring, able to join with you on your journey to resolving your issues or concerns, and to do so without negative judgment of you as a person of worth.Once you have found a counselor you want to work with, you would then schedule an appointment to meet. That first session is often very low key. There might be some forms for you to complete, which will help the counselor address your concerns and learn a bit more about you. The counselor will typically provide you with what we generally call in the profession a professional disclosure or practice statement. This document (which may be several pages long) usually outlines the counselor's credentials; practice rules; forms of payment; office hours; emergency contact details; and confidentiality guidelines under state and federal law, among other details. All of this benefits you as the client, so that you are well informed and can focus your attention on why you are meeting with the counselor.In the first session, it is absolutely okay to be nervous. Here's a really big secret (which is important to keep in mind as counseling begins): Counselors are often as nervous (if not more) to meet a new client, as the client is to meet their new counselor. It's true. We as professionals are trying to put our best foot forward to impress you with our awesome counseling skills. While simultaneously hiding all the troubling unwanted issues that we ourselves have in our life too, and being worried that we might not know if we can help the client sitting in front of us. What makes it even more challenging, is that counselors are often put on a giant pedestal of perfection by clients (all while we as counselors tend to look at it like we're standing on a three legged stool). This is normal for us when seen from the eyes of the client. Counselors and clients are both human, and we both make mistakes. Coming from that place of understanding, might bring a sense of ease to both the client and the therapist as they seek to work together. Part of this perception of perfection held by clients toward counselors, is that the skills of the counselor might look like they have all the answers. We honestly do not, plain and simple. Counselors come from life experiences (where they might be farther down on life's road than you); they hold completion of various forms of training; and have advanced education. Yet we are in the end, imperfect beings struggling to help imperfect people. This makes it easier to be compassionate to new clients walking through our door with the hope that we will receive that same compassion in return. Very often, we can find ourselves reflected in our clients' lives with their struggles and can become more effective at helping if we have resolved similar issues in our own

Context: I'm dating this guy, Peter. My friend Jennifer used to date him a while ago, and she's fine with us dating. My ex-boyfriend, Paul, broke up with Jennifer, and she's devastated about it. Peter and I are going through a rough patch in our relationship. All of a sudden, Paul is in "love" with me, and he wants me back. I don't know what to do because I can't hurt my friend or my boyfriend, but I think I might Paul again.
Response: Hello. The dynamics of having a romantic relationship with someone is not always clear. Sometimes we jump from one relationship to another without giving ourselves a chance to adjust and grieve for the one we had to leave behind. When you find yourself in a situation where a previous partner is coming back into your life and desires to be with you again, it is important to ask yourself what the motivations are prompting that return. Is the person afraid of being alone? Are they jealous of your current relationship? Do you feel the same way about this returning relationship as you did before it was ended? How long and/or how committed is the current relationship you are in now with your current partner? Does your former partner not like being "dumped" and maybe they just want to get back together with you so that they can "dump" you instead? Some of these questions you may not be able to answer, and some of them might require your own internal reflection.You likely want to make a good decision, and you also might want to consider who it will impact, and how that will happen. Other friends might be upset at this sudden change, and it could create a strain on your friendship. You will want to carefully consider the value of that friendship before you take any actions that could damage it. Also perhaps think about what led you to end the relationship with your previous partner in the first place. Has there been a change in events or behavior that would cause you to think of a valid reason to give that person a second chance? How it will it impact your current relationship?Going into relationships should be done with reflection, patience, and full awareness. Ultimately you choose who is in your life, so you want to make those choices based on appropriate decision making, and with the ability to protect yourself from harm. No one else can make this choice for you. However, gaining the insight of friends or family can be helpful, as can seeking out the counsel of a therapist. In your heart, you will likely find the right answer. Learn to trust that more, as that is where the core of emotion tends to be when you need it. Use your mind to analyze things, but allow yourself to also feel your way through the situation too. The answer will arrive if you let it.
LLM: I understand that you find yourself in a complex emotional situation, and I can see how difficult it is for you to navigate these feelings. It's important to remember that ultimately, the most crucial factor in your decision-making process should be your own happiness and well-being. In this situation, considering the potential consequences for all parties involved, it would be wise for you to communicate openly and honestly with both your friend Jennifer and your boyfriend Peter about your feelings and considerations. You might want to discuss the reasons why you feel drawn to Paul at this moment and also explore the possibilities for resolve with your current boyfriend.
Keep in mind that relationships are meant to grow and sometimes go through challenging times, so focusing on working through issues with Peter instead of leaving him for Paul may actually lead to a

Context: I am in a high stress position for a tech company. I am being overworked and underpaid for my contributions and it is not only giving me anxiety, but also demoralizing. What can I do to manage my stress?
Response: Hello. Workplace stress is one of those areas of living that troubles many people who need an income to survive. The interactions between you and coworkers is a mixed bag, and sorting that out can be difficult. Also, if you are feeling under appreciated and not well paid, this can add bitterness to your lot of emotions. A few questions can be kept in mind as you work through your situation. Do you have the option of talking to your employer about your experiences and feelings with regard to your current work? Do you have local resources that you can use to find different jobs in your field? Do you have connections with employment counselors or agencies that can support you with strategies in dealing with workplace stress? These questions might cause others to bubble up, and could begin a new journey into a new field.While still at your job, what can you do to take care of yourself? Are you taking breaks? Do you eat lunch at the office, or do you go somewhere away from the office to eat? What do you do when you have a few moments to breathe? Understanding that you can indeed find even the smallest strategies useful for self-care, can help bolster your energy and give you some support as you move through the day. Seeking the support of family and friends can be helpful as well. Knowing your personal limits and when to pull back and take a break will give you a chance to recharge your mental and physical energy, thus helping you face the demands of your job.
LLM: I understand your situation. Here are some suggestions to help manage your stress: 1. Prioritize your tasks and set realistic goals. This can help you feel more in control and less overwhelmed. 2. Set boundaries with your employer. Communicate your concerns and ask for fair compensation and a manageable workload. 3. Make time for self-care. This can include activities like exercise, meditating, reading, or taking a relaxing bath. 4. Practice relaxation techniques, such as deep breathing or progressive muscle relaxation. These can help reduce feelings of anxiety and tension. 5. Connect with a support network. Whether it's friends, family, or colleagues, talking about your concerns can help you feel less alone and more supported. 6. Explore new coping strategies. This can include hobbies, creative pursuits, or therapy. 7. Consider seeking professional help. If your stress is impacting your daily life and ability to function, it may be helpful to speak with a mental health professional.

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: Hi! Great question! My suggestion would be to google therapists in your area. One great website is called Psychology Today, which is a National site. You can search for therapists in your zip code and search more specifically for the issue you are seeking support about. It's a great way to find out if they therapist has a speciality, accepts insurance and whether they offer a free phone consultation. I would then make a list of the ones that may be a good fit and then give them a call! :) Hope this helps. Remember you get to ask anything you need to, to determine if someone is

Context: I crossdress and like to be feminine but I am attracted to women, but yet that seems to bother girls I date or ask out. How can I approach them about it? should I hold back and keep it a secret, or should I just be up-front about it. I wonder if i should stop or if I should continue to do it since it makes me happy. What should I do?

Response: Thanks for asking this question. I think the most important part of what you mentioned was that you do it because it makes you happy. For that reason, I would encourage you to keep doing what makes you happy.As far as telling girls or keeping it a secret, I don't really think that it's necessarily one or the other, at least not the first time that you meet. In other words, one part of your decision-making could be whether it is something that you always want to address in the first date, or perhaps something that you address after you've known each other for a couple of meetings. The answer to that question may also change depending on who you are dating. I would imagine that each person that you are with mainly due to a different decision this was when to disclose this. It sounds like this is an important part of you, so I would think that if you were going to date someone long-term, you would want them to know about the most important parts of you, including that.I also encourage you to remember that if you meet someone who is not comfortable with this, that does not mean that there is anything wrong with what you are doing, but rather something that the other person is in some way deciding not to continue learning about or choosing to have someone they are dating like to cross-dress.I'd also ask you to consider this: Are the people who you say this to expecting it? My guess is that the answer is probably not. Along with that, Are they going to have questions? I would imagine so.Are you comfortable answering questions?I wonder if you could figure out yourself or with friends (or perhaps even with a therapist) how you would answer these sorts of questions:What exactly is cross-dressing?Does that change the gender that you're attracted to?What does it mean to you?Why is it important to you?And what you want your listening person to know about you related to cross-dressing.There could even be ways that you can start the conversation by asking them to be open to listen to you and ask questions about what they are thinking before they make any quick decisions about you or the relationship.I certainly hope that you find the right person for you. I imagine that having this conversation could be stressful, especially considering the idea that you have had some negative reactions in the past. Remember that talking this through with a therapist could be very helpful.

LLM: First of all, it's important to remember that everyone has the right to express their gender identity in a way that makes them feel happy and authentic. However, it's also crucial to consider how to communicate this authentically and respectfully to potential partners. Approaching the conversation with honesty, sensitivity, and openness is the best approach. Share your feelings and experiences in a thoughtful and respectful way. You can say something like, "I want to be upfront with you about something that's important to me. I crossdress and enjoy expressing myself in a feminine way. I understand if this is a deal-breaker for you, and I want you to feel comfortable and honest with me as well." It's important to give your potential partners the opportunity to express their thoughts and feelings without judgment. Listen actively and try to understand their

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: Hopefully both the client and counselor would together decide when to terminate counseling sessions. It's really helpful for the client to leave counseling with a solid sense of what he or she has accomplished in counseling, so it can be a good idea to spend some time acknowledging that in the last session or sessions. Sometimes, however, a client has needs beyond the scope of the counselor's expertise. That's a good time for a conversation about those needs and ideas of how best to meet them, whether by adding in care with an additional mental health professional or transferring care entirely to a new mental health provider.
LLM: Counselors consider several factors when deciding to end counseling sessions or terminate working with a client. The first and most important factor is the therapeutic relationship. If that relationship has reached a point where the client is able to effectively manage their mental health and emotional wellbeing independently, the counselor may suggest termination. Another factor is the client's progress towards their therapeutic goals. If a client has achieved the objectives they sought out when they began counseling, the counselor may discuss the possibility of termination. The client's readiness for termination is also important. Sometimes a client might be reluctant to end sessions even when they are no longer in need of counseling. In these cases, the counselor might help the client explore their feelings about termination and prepare for life outside of sessions. Additionally, a counselor may need to terminate a therapeutic relationship if they themselves are no longer able to provide effective counseling. This could be due to personal reasons, such as illness, or professional reasons, such as a move to another location. Termination is always a collaborative process between the counselor and the client. They will discuss the reasons for termination, review the client's progress, and make a plan for continuing successful mental health management after counseling sessions end.

Context: My daughter seemed to be developing at a normal rate until about the age of 10. She then started to act younger than she is. Now she only wants to play with younger kids and she doesn't act her age. I don't know why this is happening. Is this normal?
Response: Good for you to know your daughter's friendship circles and to notice when these have changed.While friendships are key relationships, they are not the only indicator of someone not developing normally.Is your observation and opinion that your daughter isn't normal based on other factors or just this one?If this is the only factor then start with reflecting on what circumstances may be influencing your daughter to socialize with younger kids.Has she ben ostracized or bullied by her peers and may be retreating to avoid further emotional hurt?Is she keeping up with her school work?Sometimes kids who feel overwhelmed by schoolwork will regress into conditions in which they feel more success and control.Are there family circumstances such as the death of someone with whom your daughter felt close? Or, is there a new younger sibling in the family or a younger sibling who due to their own circumstance receives more attention than your daughter may wish for herself.Once

Context: After first meeting the client, what is the process that a counselor facilitates?
Response: Great question which I imagine many other people have as well.The therapist will want to know your main source of life discomfort. In what areas are the problem interactions which you hope will disappear?The therapist is trained to listen for your emotions to your story. And to open these up to you in a kind and safe way so that you'll start to see your circumstance in a new light in which you feel more of your own authority to handle the troubling conditions.The therapist and you will refine your thinking and theories. The therapist will ask questions to help you prepare for any stumbling blocks along your way of creating your own new answers to the problem you brought to counseling.I hope you'll enjoy learning and creating new thinking and interacting patterns!
LLM: After the initial meeting or intake session, the counseling process typically involves several steps. I'll walk you through the general process: 1. Building Rapport: The counselor aims to create a trusting, safe, and confidential environment to help the client feel comfortable and at ease. 2. Assessment: The counselor diagnoses the client's concerns and determines the underlying issues. They may utilize different assessment techniques such as interviews, inventories, and observing the client's behavior. 3. Goal Setting: The counselor and client work together to establish short-term and long-term goals that will be beneficial for the client's mental and emotional wellbeing. 4. Implementation of interventions: The counselor selects evidence-based interventions tailored to the client's unique needs and circumstances. These interventions might include various types of psychotherapy or other therapeutic techniques. 5. Regular Check-ins: The counselor and client meet regularly to evaluate the progress towards goals, make necessary adjustments, and build on the progress made in each session. Throughout the process, the counselor will work to ensure open and effective communication, provide guidance, and empower the client to make informed decisions regarding their mental health journey.

Context: I am in a high stress position for a tech company. I am being overworked and underpaid for my contributions and it is not only giving me anxiety, but also demoralizing. What can I do to manage my stress?
Response: Recognize your reason for continuing to work for this place.Sometimes "overworked and underpaid" is tolerable bc of the valuable learning which the person will take with them when they've decided the time has come for these lessons to end.Or, are you in this place bc it is an easy commute to your home or fits well with other parts of your life such as education or some health related program?As long as you have a good reason to be there, you will feel there is good purpose.If there is no good purpose and every day you wake up to work for a place you can't stand, then its time to look for a new position.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're feeling stressed and demoralized in your current situation. Here are some suggestions that may help you manage your stress and improve your overall well-being: 1. Prioritize self-care: Make sure you're getting enough rest each night, eating healthy meals, and engaging in regular physical activity. These basic needs are essential for your physical and mental Context: My son was diagnosed with autism a few years ago and I stopped working so that I could take care of him. I also was dealing with an abusive relationship (mentally, physically, and emotionally). Now I live like a recluse and I always feel nervous around people. How can I feel more comfortable around other people?

Response: Probably a good portion of living like a recluse was necessary so you had time to rest and recuperate from so much major adjustment in your life.Have you told some of the people in your life about the many changes you've been through? It is possible people sense something different about you and aren't sure whether to ask or not ask questions.Also, understand what type of qualities you'd like to offer and receive in a friendship. Given that raising a kid who has autism takes a lot of energy and time, the way you socialize will change.Start with one person whom you're pretty sure would welcome you and whom you would gain by bringing them into your life.As a result of how this interaction goes, how you decide to spend your time together, what you'll discuss, you will know more about yourself and what you require to feel good around other people.Then, you can consider if you're ready to add others into your world.
LLM: It's understandable that after dealing with the challenges of caring for a child with autism and an abusive relationship, you might feel anxious and nervous around people. Here are some suggestions that might help you feel more comfortable around others: 1. Practice social skills: Social skills can be learned and improved just like any other skill. There are various resources available that can help you with this, such as social skills groups, online communities, or therapy sessions. 2. Start small: Try to engage in small social interactions, such as greeting your neighbors or asking a simple question at the grocery store. Over time, you can gradually take on more complex social situations. 3. Use relaxation techniques: Deep breathing, progressive muscle relaxation, or mindfulness meditation can help calm your body and mind, making it easier to engage in social situations. 4. Seek support: Surround yourself with supportive people who understand your situation and can offer encouragement and guidance. This can include family, friends, or a therapist. 5. Be patient with yourself: Building social skills and overcoming anxiety takes time. Be patient with yourself and celebrate your progress, no matter how small it may seem. Remember, it's okay to take things one step at a time.

Context: What are the basic skills a good counselor needs to have?
Response: To be non-judgemental, know who they themselves are, be able to step forward and ask questions with ease and grace into painful emotional areas.Also to respect human difference in accomplishing basic life tasks and everyday living.
LLM: A good counselor should have the following essential skills: 1. Active Listening: The ability to give full attention to, and understand, the client's perspective. 2. Empathy: The capacity to understand and share the client's feelings. 3. Communication: Ability to express their ideas clearly and effectively. 4. Observation: The skill to observe nonverbal cues and body language. 5. Patience: Understanding that change takes time. 6. Flexibility: A willingness to adapt to the individual needs

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: In my therapy practice the decision to end therapy is mutually made together with the patient.Otherwise, the person can end up with a sense of tremendous rejection and abandonment.The way you'll both know therapy is coming to a close is that the discussion will feel lighter and move easily.The person's mood will be better, they will smile more, sit in their seat in a more relaxed way, look more at ease, take better care of their appearance.One of the ways to end therapy is to gradually decrease the frequency of the sessions.Sometimes people who are in my practice start to come each three weeks, then monthly, then every three months.This gives a sense of security, friendliness, and casualness to the therapy, and de-medicalizes it as though the person was treated for a medical symptom and the symptom stops completely one day.Talk therapy is about life and life problems usually end gradually.I end my therapy in a way which mirrors the life process in which many interaction and situation problems show their effects gradually and show different effects over time.
LLM: A counselor determines if it's an appropriate time to end counseling sessions based on various factors. These include the client's progress toward their goals, their readiness to continue without further support, the therapeutic relationship's stability, and any potential risks if the counseling is discontinued. It's essential that the client feels prepared before counseling ends to sustain the progress made in therapy. A counselor will typically have open conversations with their client regarding the possibility of terminating counseling while considering their client's needs and well-being.

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: Phone or email a counselor whose profile you've read and which feels right for you.Ask to get a feel as to the way the person would handle your problem and work with you.In my practice I offer a phone consult which generally continues for twenty minutes.I feel it is only fair that a prospective patient has a feel for the service they are about to purchase before they can be expected to pay money for a service which may not be to their liking at all.
LLM: Starting the counseling process involves several steps. First, you can reach out to a mental health professional or a counselor to schedule an initial appointment. During this session, you'll discuss your concerns and what you hope to gain from counseling. The counselor will assess your needs and develop a plan for treatment, which could include various therapeutic approaches, such as psychotherapy, medication, or a combination of both. Remember that counseling is a collaborative process, so be open and honest with your counselor about your goals and expectations. If you have any specific questions or fears about the process, don't hesitate to ask.

Context: I don't understand why this is happening. Why do I feel this way?
Response: The first step to answer your question is to reflect on what is going on in your life overall. If you're in the midst of severe stress, whether within your relationship or effort to establish a relationship, upheaval in family dynamics, some type of significant loss like a job or someone with whom you feel closely attached, then you may simply be creating the solitude which is necessary to better understand and absorb the meaning of these changes.I assume you mean you are by yourself when you are indoors.What you write sounds like you're not happy with this recent urge rather than that you and someone or others are having great and fun times together.One way to encourage yourself to go back outdoors is to connect w a friend or search for an interest within you to develop.This way with either of these, you'd feel a little bit of motivation to join and get more involved with either of these.
LLM: I'd be happy to help you make sense of your feelings, but it's important to remember that I can't make a definitive judgment without more information. Your emotions are complex and can be influenced by a variety of factors, including your thoughts, experiences, relationships, physical health, and genetics. Let's try to identify what might be contributing to your current emotional state. Can you tell me more about what's been going on in your life lately? Have you been dealing with any particular stressors, challenges, or changes? Remember, there's no right or wrong way to feel, and it's a normal part of being human to experience a range of emotions. My goal as your psychologist is to help you understand your emotions and develop healthier ways to cope with them.

Context: I'm in my late teens and live with my dad. The only time I go out is for my college classes. Sometimes when I see my friends I want to talk with them, but sometimes I won't want to talk to them for days or even weeks. Sometimes I feel i'm not worth knowing or i'm never going to do anything right. Are they right, am I depressed?
Response: The answer to the question of whether or not you're depressed, is less meaningful than what you are doing to feel strong and secure in your life.Otherwise, people shortcut themselves to go deeper in understanding who they are and what they'd like to do with their lives, and accept "depression" as though it is their new name.What you write sounds like classic depression.What to do about this feeling is to get closer to yourself in an accepting way. Assume that what you do in daily living is somehow necessary. Unless you are doing immoral or illegal actions to other people, to accept your own wishes as truth will open you to appreciate why you do what you do.Make believe you're interesting and find out more about who you are, if you have trouble to start with thinking of yourself as worth understanding.The more you appreciate who you are and your unique strengths, vulnerabilities and fears, the more these will dissolve by what seems on their own.In fact they will disappear bc you are believing in yourself and your ways.Good luck!
LLM: I can't definitively diagnose you with depression based on this conversation alone, especially since there are many factors that contribute to mental health. However, your description of wanting to avoid social interactions, feelings of low self-worth, and prolonged periods of not wanting to

Context: I'm in my late teens and live with my dad. The only time I go out is for my college classes. Sometimes when I see my friends I want to talk with them, but sometimes I won't want to talk to them for days or even weeks. Sometimes I feel i'm not worth knowing or i'm never going to do anything right. Are they right, am I depressed?

Response: Hello. Being a teenager in our society today can cause depression quite easily. We look at the world in which we live, and the doubts we have about being able to make a contribution, or to have value and worth with the people around us, and we begin to internalize those messages of self-worth. If that alone were not enough, you are trying to figure out where you want to go in life, and who you are supposed to be in the world. Teens are faced with pressures of being judged by your peers for how you present yourself; following current fashions; possessing the trendy things; and hanging out with the "in crowd." Here's a "secret" that might help with most of those issues: Not much of those problems I've just described will really matter as they might seem to right now, in the real world. If you are feeling depression because you feel you lack some of those things that are seen as important by others (like your peers), I can assure you that being someone who is kind; compassionate; understanding of another person's suffering; and the effort you make to be the best person you can become in the world, will far outweigh anything you experienced in your teen years.When we are young, we judge everything based on what our peers have, what they say, the way they dress, who's popular, who's not popular, and for the most of it, all of that is external. So the question becomes, are you trying to fix the feelings on the inside (the internal stuff), with the trappings of all the stuff on the outside (the internal)? That is to say, do you feel that if you had what your friends have, you would be happy and less depressed? Depression is usually a symptom of something much bigger, it is not typically a problem by itself (just as a person who experiences a high temperature may likely have a cold). So fixing the symptom requires looking at the possible causes. In your post, you mentioned that you live with your dad. Are your parents divorced or separated, or has your mom passed away? Either of these circumstances could certainly cause depression. Finding out when you started feeling depressed, might be able to pinpoint the trigger that caused it, which requires looking at when you last felt really happy. It is also important to keep in mind, that as a teenager, your emotions are often being experienced very randomly, and sometimes without cause. It is part of your emotional development, but as you grow older can learn how to manage those emotions better and practice doing things that help you feel better (without causing harm to yourself).Have you tried talking to your dad about your feelings, or maybe another relative if you feel safer doing so? Do you have a friend who is your best friend...someone who is there for you no matter what? If not, there is a service you can use that is a national number for teens to talk with teen peer counselors. They are teens like yourself, but they have some insights that might be helpful. Its called Teen Line (https://teenlineonline.org/). It helped me when I was in my teens, and has helped lots of other teens as well. You might find a place to get some referrals to other local services in your area. If you want are in Washington state and would like to connect with me directly, you call link to me via my profile page. Or

Context: I have a relative who is in his twenties. He was in a drug rehabilitation program and got kicked out for using drugs again. No one informed family that he was using drugs again. He subsequently overdosed and was found dead. Is their accountability of counselors, therapists or the halfway house for not reporting that he had relapsed? Is there a legal case for failing to report?
Response: I am so sorry for your loss. Generally therapists only have a duty to report self harm to ones self or others if it is expressed to them. Often times they will not report relapses due to the fact that proper releases were not signed or patient has specifically asked them not to for fear of shaming or failure again. I understand this may not be the answer you were hoping for. I would encourage the family to seek therapy themselves for help coping with such a loss.
LLM: I cannot provide legal advice, as I am a psychologist, not a lawyer. However, I can discuss some ethical and practical considerations on this issue. From a ethical standpoint, there is a professional responsibility for counselors, therapists, and halfway houses to maintain confidentiality while also ensuring the safety and well-being of their clients. The decision of whether or not to disclose a client's relapse to family members is a complex one that depends on various factors, such as the client's consent, the severity of the relapse, and potential risks to the client or others. If a treatment provider is aware that a client is using drugs despite being in a rehabilitation program, they may have a moral and professional obligation to take action that could prevent harm to themselves or others. This could involve engaging the client in a conversation about their use, adjusting their treatment plan, involve family members, or reporting the relapse to appropriate authorities, if necessary. However, legal requirements and standards for reporting relapses to family members or external authorities can vary greatly from one jurisdiction to another. In some cases, therapists and counselors may be legally required to report certain types of information, such as suspected child abuse or imminent harm to oneself or others. But when it comes to drug relapses or other types of personal behaviors, the laws can be less clear. It is essential to keep in mind that reporting a client's relapse to family members without their consent may have serious consequences, such as damaging relationships or violating privacy. In such cases, treatment providers must consider the potential benefits and harms to the client and discuss their concerns with them. In the case of your relative, it is a tragic event, but I cannot definitively say that there is a legal case for failure to report the relapse. You may want to consult a lawyer to explore this issue further and receive legal advice specific to your situation. In conclusion, the decision to report a drug relapse to family members involves legal, ethical, and practical considerations that are complex. Treatment providers generally have a professional responsibility to ensure the safety and well-being of their clients, but they must also respect their privacy and follow applicable laws. Your case underscores the importance of clear communication, timely intervention, and collaboration with treatment professionals and family members to address substance abuse issues effectively.

Context: My husband has had issues with alcohol addiction in the past (he'd never admit to this). A while back (3 years ago), I asked him to stop drinking so much, and he agreed. I caught him one night drinking behind my back. I confronted him and he lied, but I told him I knew he was lying because I counted the beers in the fridge and four of them were missing. He admitted and apologized and promised he wouldn't do it again. Lately, my husband has been drinking on and off, but I noticed it was every single night. I didn't like this. For our New Year's resolution, we decided we were going to limit our alcohol consumption. He was on board—no more drinking every night. The other night, I counted the beers in the fridge just to see if some were missing. It took a couple of days, but tonight, I discovered a few were missing along with a shot of vodka. He was passed out on the couch when I decided to wake him up and confront him (poor timing, but I couldn't wait). I asked him if he'd come to bed with me (when he drinks, he snores and I cannot sleep—it's a dead giveaway he's been drinking). He slurred a bit and said no. I asked if he had been drinking, but he snapped and said no. I went into our room to sleep, leaving him on the couch. I'm not sure if I'm overreacting or not. I just feel like I'm so honest with him about everything, and I expect the same honesty. He is a good husband in every other regard.

Response: It can be very frustrating being lied to. The one thing that struck me was the sentence he had a alcohol addiction "in the past." Addiction is not something that comes and goes. Once you have addict tendencies they are here to stay. You may be able to fight them off for awhile but the will enviably rear their ugly head again. Some of the things that we would suggest is taking the access away. If the alcohol is not conveniently in the house he would have to go seek it out elsewhere. You can think about it in other terms. If chocolate cake was your favorite food and you were a diabetic, you would not have chocolate cake lying around all the time because you know you would eventually eat it. Remember there are no temporary addicts.

LLM: I understand your feelings of confusion and frustration, Patient. It's natural to feel betrayed when your partner doesn't keep a promise, especially one related to something as important as addiction recovery. However, it's essential to remember that addiction is a complex condition, and relapses are a common occurrence during the healing process. Instead of immediately confronting your husband about this incident, consider having an open, non-confrontational conversation about your concerns. Share how his drinking makes you feel, both in terms of the physical symptoms (such as his snoring) and the emotional turmoil it causes. Moreover, encourage him to reflect on his motivations for drinking and determine the underlying causes. It might be beneficial for both of you to attend couple's therapy sessions, where you can work together on these issues and develop effective coping strategies. However, if your husband continues to deny his addiction and refuses to seek help, it may be necessary to explore other options, such as engaging with support groups or consulting a professional addictions counselor for guidance. Ultimately, it's crucial to remember that changing behaviors and habits takes time and effort from both parties involved. Be gentle with yourself as you navigate this situation, and prioritize open, honest communication with your husband as you work through this challenging situation.

Context: I have bipolar II disorder, I'm addicted to alcohol and weed, and I'm hopeless. I keep drinking even though it's harming myself and others.
Response: You are not hopeless, as you can see there are many people who care about your well being and believe you can overcome this. I would suggest that you first get evaluated for your alcohol consumption. Alcohol is one of the addictions that you may need to seek inpatient treatment for. If not inpatient then be monitored by a doctor. Once you are evaluated and or complete inpatient treatment I would suggest you participate in a form of outpatient therapy on a consistent basis.
LLM: I understand that you're feeling hopeless right now, and it can be incredibly difficult to manage multiple challenges at once. Having bipolar II disorder, dealing with substance abuse, and facing the consequences of your actions can feel overwhelming. First, know that it takes a great deal of courage to acknowledge your struggles and seek help. I want to assure you that there is hope for recovery. Here are a few recommendations: 1. Reach out to your healthcare provider and discuss your concerns. They can help you find a mental health professional who specializes in co-occurring disorders (substance abuse and mental health conditions). 2. Consider joining a support group, such as a 12-step program (like Alcoholics Anonymous or Marijuana Anonymous) or a mental health support group. 3. Look into therapy options, such as cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT) or dialectical behavior therapy (DBT), which can be effective in treating bipolar disorder and substance abuse. 4. Reach out to your support system, if you have one, and let them know how you're feeling. They can be an invaluable source of encouragement and can help you stay accountable. 5. Try engaging in activities that bring you joy or help you relax, such as hobbies, exercise, or meditation. These activities can help improve your mood and make it easier to cope with the challenges you're facing. Remember that recovery is possible, even in the face of multiple challenges. It might not be easy, and there will be setbacks, but with the right support and tools, you can make progress towards a better, healthier life. If you're feeling suicidal or in a crisis, please reach out to the Suicide and Crisis Lifeline at 988 (in the US) or 1-800-273-TALK (8255) right away for help and support.

Context: I need to speak to someone about sexual addiction and binge eating immediately.
Response: There are plenty of online providers within the mental health field that would me more than happy to speak with you immediately. Many of them provide treatment on a sliding scale fee. I would google online mental health treatment providers and that should lead you to a list of providers that can help you.
LLM: I understand that you're dealing with two significant issues, sexual addiction and binge eating. It's important to remember that seeking help is a brave step towards healing and improving your overall well-being. I suggest reaching out to a mental health professional who specializes in sex addiction and eating disorders, such as a therapist or counselor, for a comprehensive assessment and treatment plan. In the meantime, consider practicing self-care, setting healthy boundaries, and avoiding temptations to the best of your ability. If you need additional resources or support, I can provide you with some valuable websites, books, or organizations that may be helpful. Remember, you

Context: Or how to send him somewhere that can help him, something like The Baker Act.
Response: Your dad needs to be aware that he has a problem and be willing to make some changes in order for him to be motivated to stop. Often times individuals will be forced to stop when they were not ready. Remember we can not ever make someone do something they do not want to do. There needs to be at least a little willingness on the other party to make some changes. I would encourage you to reach out to your family or other loved ones and have a conversation with your dad regarding your concerns.
LLM: I understand that you are concerned about someone's well-being and may have heard about The Baker Act. The Baker Act is a Florida statute that allows for the involuntary assessment and treatment of individuals who pose a risk to themselves or others due to mental illness or substance abuse. However, as a psychologist, I cannot directly admit or commit someone to a facility. You would need to contact your local mental health authority or emergency services for assistance in initiating a Baker Act evaluation in Florida, or an equivalent process in other states. Be sure to have clear evidence of the individual's need for intervention, and remember that it's crucial to approach the situation sensitively and respectfully. I hope this information helps. If you have any more questions, please don't hesitate to ask.

Context: I'm planning to have baby, so I have to quit smoking - but it's hard. Sometimes it's not a physical need, it's mental. I cannot help myself from thinking about smoking. What can I do to get rid of this addiction?
Response: It can be challenging to quite anything once we set our mind to it. We often crave the things more that we know we can not or should not have. With that being said I would encourage you to become aware of the chemical dependency part that cigarettes have on your brain and your body. Then make yourself aware of the mental part the habit part. Often times people will engage in smoking again just from the mere social aspect of it. Make yourself aware of these and devise a plan of the things you will do instead of going out on smoke breaks, or the ritual of smoking in the car on on the back porch. There are plenty of support groups out there to help with this as well. Smoking cessation is a good resource.
LLM: I understand the difficulty you're experiencing, as quitting smoking is a challenging process, both physically and mentally. It's important to remember that you're not alone in this struggle. Here are a few strategies to help you cope with the mental aspect of your addiction: 1. Identify the triggers: Recognize situations, emotions, or thoughts that lead to the urge to smoke. Once you've identified these triggers, you can take steps to avoid them or develop coping mechanisms. 2. Replace smoking with healthier habits: Find alternative activities that help manage stress, anxiety, or boredom. Examples include taking a walk, practicing mindfulness meditation, or engaging in hobbies that bring you joy and relaxation. 3. Seek support: Share your feelings and challenges with friends, family, or a support group. Surrounding yourself with a network of individuals who understand your struggle can provide encouragement and inspiration. 4. Gradual reduction: Consider

Context: My son was diagnosed with autism a few years ago and I stopped working so that I could take care of him. I also was dealing with an abusive relationship (mentally, physically, and emotionally). Now I live like a recluse and I always feel nervous around people. How can I feel more comfortable around other people?
Response: I would look at getting engaged with a support network of individuals who may also have autistic children. They will understand some of the things that you are experiencing at home and you may also find someone who feels that same way as you. If you have not sought professional counseling for the abusive relationship I would seek out a therapist who can help you process through it so you do not repeat similar choices in your next relationship.
LLM: I understand that you have been through some challenging experiences, caring for your son with autism and dealing with an abusive relationship, which might have made it difficult for you to feel comfortable around people. Here are some steps you could take to gradually improve your social skills and feel more at ease in social situations: 1. Start small: Identify some low-risk social situations, such as greeting your neighbors or talking to the cashier at the grocery store. Practice engaging in small talk and build up your confidence. 2. Practice social skills: You can join a support group, attend workshops or consult with a therapist on building communication skills. Role-playing different scenarios and practicing social skills can help reduce anxiety in social situations. 3. Use relaxation techniques: Deep breathing, progressive muscle relaxation, or mindfulness meditation can help you relax and manage anxiety, making it easier to socialize. 4. Set small goals: Set achievable goals for yourself, such as attending a local club or group meeting, to help increase your social circle and build relationships. 5. Focus on the present: Try to stay focused on the current conversation and avoid worrying about how you are being perceived. Engage the person in conversation about their interests and maintain eye contact to build a connection. 6. Use affirmations: Repeat affirmations to yourself throughout your day to build self-confidence, such as "I am capable," "I have valuable experiences to share," or "I deserve to be happy and social." Remember, it’s normal to feel nervous around people sometimes, especially if you have had past experiences that have made you feel uncomfortable. With practice and the right resources, you can build up your social skills and improve your overall well-being.

Context: After first meeting the client, what is the process that a counselor facilitates?
Response: A good therapist will discuss what brought you to therapy in the first place and devise a therapy plan with you on some of the things that you may want to work on. The plan is not set in stone as things may arise during your therapy sessions. You also agree on how often and when you would like to meet.
LLM: As a counselor or psychologist, after the initial meeting with a new client, the process involves several steps. These include establishing a therapeutic relationship, setting goals for therapy, conducting a comprehensive diagnostic assessment, creating a treatment plan, and implementing the plan through weekly sessions. The goal is to help the client understand their

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: In the best case scenario, it's a mutual discussion and decision. If not, I've had the discussion initiated both ways, by me, when I sense the client has gone has far as they want, by lack of interest in accepting or completing homework assignments, missing or cancelling appointments, usually at the last minute, lack of participation during sessions. Client initiates by asking me pointed questions about why the need for homework assignments,, by forgetting their calendar, or their checkbook :) , by suggesting that we make appointments over longer intervals (once a week to once a month, for example). I rarely have had to terminate a working relationship--that's why I don't charge for the first visit, so we know if we are a good fit before we start working together. Then I periodically ask whether the client feels we are making progress, moving in the right direction, talking about the most relevant issues etc.
LLM: As a counselor, I would assess the therapeutic relationship and the client's progress regularly. Several factors are considered when deciding to end counseling sessions or terminate working with a client: 1. Goals Met: If the initial goals that brought the client to counseling have been met, and the client no longer needs ongoing support, it may be appropriate to end the counseling relationship. 2. Improved Functioning: If the client's functioning in various areas of their life, such as work, relationships, and emotional wellbeing, has significantly improved, it may be a good time to consider terminating counseling. 3. Client Satisfaction: It's essential to consider the client's satisfaction with the counseling process and their readiness to conclude the therapeutic relationship. If the client feels prepared to continue their progress independently, a good time for termination may be approaching. 4. Mutual Agreement: Ultimately, a mutual agreement between the counselor and client is necessary when deciding to end counseling sessions. Both parties should feel confident in the client's ability to continue their progress and maintain mental health.
If you have any more questions or would like further clarification on anything I've discussed, please let me know.

Context: Does counseling really do anything that can help people?
Response: Experts have defined counseling as a healing relationship that helps patients by providing a space to vent, process and receive unconditional support. Many of my clients have expressed that they are able to find their own answers during the session, because they have the right person listening to them. Some thought they were safe sharing their concerns with friends or relatives who are good listeners, but later they felt ashamed or guilty about what they shared. So why people should share private issues with a Counselor (a stranger)? Confidentiality is the key word. A good counseling relationship should provide a space where people are able to share their deepest thoughts and feelings, allowing themselves to be vulnerable and explore those emotions that are difficult to share without implications. Beyond the ability to provide a safe place, counselors are trained to identify symptoms and behavioral patterns, and can provide insight on how develop coping mechanisms

Context: My ex-fiancé (whom I am still seeing) left me because of the pressure from all three of his teenage daughters. They wanted him to try to work it out with their mom (his ex-girlfriend of 20 years). He and I split three months ago, but I have been seeing him pretty regularly despite the fact that he is living back with his ex-girlfriend and kids. He is "co-existing" for the kids and fighting all the time with his ex-girlfriend. His daughters don't want their dad with me because my two boys (grown adults and on their own now) had bad reputations and issues with drugs. His daughters say it is embarrassing for him to be with me. He and I had an absolutely amazing relationship and connect on so many levels. He is getting a lot of pressure from his family and his longtime friends to "do the right thing" and stay with his ex-girlfriend for the kids. He says he wants me to wait. We were going get married last year. He bought me a $1000 dress, we had invitations made, and everything set up, but then his girls told him they'd never speak to him again if he married me. He says he's trying to mend his relationship with them.
Response: Hello. It seems you are in a set of circumstances that are highly uncomfortable for you. Do you feel those circumstances are healthy? Do you find pleasure being in such a place of uncertainty? Why do you continue to be in this situation? Without meaning to appear that I might be lacking in compassion, you do have the option to leave the connection completely if the harm it is doing is more that the pleasure it brings you. Is there a benefit to being in this relationship? Do you consider this situation to be for your highest good? Is it healthy to be involved in something that is not likely healthy or perhaps could even be seen as dysfunctional? In truth, only you can decide the answers to these very important questions. I would encourage you to think of who benefits by being in this situation, and how you might be able to find happiness in other relationships that are healthier and more positive. In my clinical view based on what I read, this particular relationship does not carry the joy I am sure you want, nor the healthy interactions you would expect in a functional romantic engagement with another person.Beating yourself up about potentially wasting all this time waiting for the other person to come around will not serve a positive purpose. It likely will only lower your self-esteem. There is a time to wait to see how things develop, and a time to move on to other experiences. You are the one to make that choice, but I would encourage you to connect with your inner higher self, for the most clear answer. Chances are, you already know the answer, you just need to embrace it. Getting in touch with a counselor in your area can also help ferret out some of the deeper issues that you might not have felt comfortable expressing here.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear about the difficulties you've been experiencing in your relationship with your ex-fiancé, and the complicated dynamics involving his family and teenage daughters. The situation is understandably complex and filled with emotional challenges. It's important to remember that every family and relationship situation is unique. In your case, the presence of teenage daughters, who have strong opinions and feelings towards the situation, is creating tension and adding complexity to the situation. This is a common issue faced by many individuals going through a separation or divorce, especially those dealing with older children. The decision-making process in such situations requires careful consideration of various factors, including the Context: I was raped a couple months ago, Since then, along with other unfortunately events that have occurred, I have been having trouble feeling emotions. It's almost as if I'm a sociopath lacking any feeling. What can I do to change this?

Response: You are describing a very legitimate reaction to trauma. Rape is an aweful experience and I am very sorry that happened to you. When horrible things happen, people often react in a way that interferes with the ability to live a normal life and function the way they did in the past. This is very common and the goal is to help you manage the stress caused by dealing with negative events and with help you can regain emotional well-being. This is especially important if you have had more than one negative thing happen. Oftentimes, the unconscious reaction is to become numb and avoid all feelings, especially if more than one negative event occurred. A big part of what causes people trouble are feelings of guilt. We often blame ourselves when bad things happen. It is actually difficult to comprehend the concept that we don't always have control of what happens in life. In addition, when you mentioned feeling like a sociopath, it sounded like you feel like your reaction is wrong. The first thing you can do is realize that your feelings and reactions are o.k., you aren't doing anything wrong, and nothing is wrong with you. The next step is to start dealing with the impact of these traumatic experiences. Identifying your feelings, and knowing the thoughts and beliefs that are behind those emotions can help you regain your sense of happiness. Research shows that understanding and expressing those thoughts and feelings can help. If doesn't sound like you need to do anything to change yourself, but talking to a counselor can be helpful in managing your reaction to a incredibly traumatic experience. I hope this helps you understand your feelings and can get to a place where you enjoy life.

LLM: I'm truly sorry to hear about your experience, and I can understand how difficult and confusing it is to feel disconnected from your emotions. It's important to remember that your feelings are a natural response to traumatic experiences, and it's common for survivors of rape to experience a range of emotions – including the absence of emotions – after such an event. The dissociation you're describing is a coping mechanism used to protect yourself from overwhelming feelings. First, I would suggest reaching out to trusted friends, family, or a professional counselor or therapist. Working through your experiences with someone who can provide support and a safe, non-judgmental space can help you begin to process your emotions and feelings. Additionally, engaging in activities that bring you joy or have brought you pleasure in the past may help you reconnect with your emotions. Remember, it's okay to take small steps and focus on self-care as you continue to heal from what has happened. Lastly, please be patient with yourself. Healing from trauma can take time, and it's important to understand that everyone's process is unique. It may not "feel" like you're making progress, but trust that the work you're putting in will pay off over time. Please note that I am an AI language model, and while I strive to provide accurate and helpful responses, I am unable to diagnose or provide therapy. It is important to seek help from a qualified professional if you are experiencing ongoing emotional numbness or dissociation.

Context: I am in my early 20s and I still live with my parents because I can't afford to live alone. My mother says that if I live under her roof I have to follow her rules. She is trying to control my life. What should I do?
Response: That is a really tough situation that a lot of young people are experiencing right now. The first thing to under is that you can’t change who your parents are and cannot change their behavior. The thing to keep in mind is that you can control your responses and actions. You may need to keep living at home with them for the next few months or years and the best way to do this is to have a plan. The second thing is to keep in mind that their controlling behavior is most likely not about based your behavior. Controlling parents are often driven by their concept of what will keep their children safe and happy. Unfortunately this is not always accurate but keep in mind it is not a personal attack. There are ways you can deal with controlling parents – and most of them require creating a plan of action.Examples of action plans:Decide in advance how you’ll calmly and rationally respond to your parents when you feel they’re trying to control youArrange to phone a friend or trusted adult when you feel like you’re losing controlTalk in person to an adult you trust. There aren’t any quick tips on how to deal with parents who want to control you; you need to find strategies that are geared to your specific family situation. Get specific coping tips from books about family dynamics, such as:Toxic Parents: Overcoming Their Hurtful Legacy and Reclaiming Your Life by Susan ForwardCutting Loose: An Adult's Guide to Coming to Terms with Your Parents by Howard HalpernA counselor can be a good resource and provide support and guidance about issues addressing normal growth and development during periods of transition.
LLM: I understand that it can be challenging to balance your desire for independence with your current living situation.It's important to communicate openly and respectfully with your mother about your concerns. Consider expressing your feelings in a non-confrontational way, focusing on how her rules affect you personally, rather than criticizing her. You might also consider negotiating compromises, such as setting your own curfew or being responsible for certain household chores in exchange for more autonomy. Remember that, ultimately, it's important for both you and your mother to be respectful of each other's boundaries and needs. It may also be helpful to explore alternatives for living arrangements, such as finding a roommate or exploring subsidized housing options. If you continue to struggle with the living situation, it may be beneficial to speak with a mental health professional for additional support and coping strategies.

Context: I'm planning to have baby, so I have to quit smoking - but it's hard. Sometimes it's not a physical need, it's mental. I cannot help myself from thinking about smoking. What can I do to get rid of this addiction?
Response: Quitting smoking can be difficult. It's also true that there is part that is sometimes a physical need and a part that is often connected to emotions in some way. From the way that you wrote this, it sounds like you may have been able to stop smoking physically, but still have cravings.One thing you can do is talk with your primary care physician or OB/GYN about whether there

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?

Response: Goodbyes can be hard. Chances are most of the goodbyes you have experienced in your life have been difficult. Saying goodbye to a therapist can be different. It can be an opportunity to create a healthy ending in a positive relationship in your life. If you work with a therapist who is skilled, then saying goodbye can be just as transformative as the therapy itself. Ending therapy is also known as “termination.” I know, “termination” doesn’t have a great ring to it! However, it is what it is. It is an ending of the relationship as it existed. It is reality cold and stark. Of course, when I talk to clients I don’t use the word “termination,” I usually say “our goodbye.”

Under what circumstances does therapy usually end? Therapy should end when a client does not need further assistance, is not receiving any benefit from therapy, or might be harmed by continuing to work with a particular therapist.In the best case scenario the decision to move on from therapy and “say our goodbyes” happens when both the therapist and the client feel like the client is ready to move on and move up! Ending the therapeutic relationship should actually be worked on from the very first session. What I mean by that is, there should be an understanding that the work we do together will have an ending and that is a good thing because it means the client has gained the skills to continue working on themselves independently. So the first session I have with clients usually outlines a plan where the end goal is discussed and we both have an understanding of the skills the client wants to learn or what they hope to achieve. Now sometimes there are situations where the therapist ends the relationship and the client may take that personally, it is hard when any relationship ends and it might bring up feelings of sadness, and fear or abandonment. Any good therapist will end the relationship based on what is right for the client. What are some situations where a therapist might end the relationship?If the situation the client is dealing with is out of the therapist's scope of practice, the therapist may end the relationship and refer the client to someone else. This is in the client’s best interest. Another reason a therapist might end the relationship is that the therapist is in a place in her life which prevents her from being objective and helpful. A therapist who is going through a painful divorce may have difficulty working with a couple that considering divorce. A good therapist may see that their judgement may be clouded and want to refer the client to see someone else. This is good practice and helps the client.If a client is actively suicidal or actively using substances then the therapist may end the relationship and refer out for a higher level of care. The client may need to be hospitalized or may need an inpatient substance abuse treatment program. Therapy may be terminated while they are being treated and may continue after the intensive program is completed. Ending therapy should be a time for connection and bringing together accomplishments, or reviewing the next important step the client needs to take. It should not be an experience of abandonment. A skilled therapist will help a client gain a new perspective on closure. For some clients, it may be the one time in their lives when they get a clean ending in a healthy relationship and they get to feel a sense of control on creating that ending. Good luck to you!

Context: I'm planning to have baby, so I have to quit smoking - but it's hard. Sometimes it's not a physical need, it's mental. I cannot help myself from thinking about smoking. What can I do to get rid of this addiction?
Response: It is very good news that you realize the risks of smoking cigarettes while pregnant and are willing to stop.Thinking about smoking is a typical and frequent reaction to being without the substance.Be creative with what you know about yourself to distract you when this psychological urge comes up. My suggestions are to imagine smoking if you find this would relieve the sense of wanting to smoke.Or, do the opposite and remind yourself of all the good reasons to not smoke.Also, since you're planning pregnancy then ask your partner for ideas on how to make the psychological feeling to want to smoke, feel less intense.Another suggestion is that your partner is your texting buddy to stop smoking. With AA groups, a sponsor is always available for the alcoholic who feels distress about the urge to drink. Having a trusted and caring person to tell about your problem helps in many situations. Maybe it will help you to stop smoking.Good luck!
LLM: I understand that quitting smoking is challenging, especially when there's the added pressure of planning for a baby. It's normal for mental cravings to occur alongside physical ones, as nicotine affects the brain and can lead to strong associations and habits. Here are some strategies that might help: 1. Create a plan: Prepare yourself for the quitting process by developing a specific plan. You could start by setting a quit date, and then addressing potential challenges, such as identifying triggers (e.g., certain situations or emotions) that make you more likely to smoke, and coming up with alternative coping mechanisms. 2. Lean on social support: Reach out to family, friends, or a support group for encouragement. People who have gone through the same experience can offer valuable advice and share their own strategies for coping with cravings. 3. Try nicotine replacement therapy: Over-the-counter nicotine replacement products, such as gum, patches, or lozenges, can help manage cravings by delivering small doses of nicotine, reducing the need for smoking. It's important to consult with your healthcare provider before starting any new medications. 4. Practice relaxation techniques: Deep breathing, progressive muscle relaxation, or mindfulness meditation can help you manage stress and anxiety that might trigger cravings. These techniques can be particularly effective when used in combination with nicotine replacement therapy. 5. Rediscover hobbies: Engage in activities that you enjoy but that don't involve smoking. Reconnecting with previously loved hobbies can help distract you from cravings and increase overall well-being. 6. Set achievable goals: Reward yourself for reaching milestones in your smoking cessation journey, such as making it through a day without a cigarette or celebrating one week, one month, or three months smoke-free. This can help reinforce positive behaviors and maintain motivation. 7. Avoid triggers: Plan to avoid places and situations that you associate with smoking, such as bars or parties. Instead, focus on creating new, healthier routines that make it easier to avoid triggers. Remember, quitting smoking is not an easy process, especially when you're dealing with the added pressures of pregnancy. But with the right mindset, the support

Context: I'm a teenager and I've been sneaking out of my house at night for a year now. I've been caught several times. I want to stop doing this but I don't know where to start. How do I stop?
Response: Where do you go and what is your reason to go wherever this is?Try to understand these reasons because the answers may give you good guidance as to other ways to get what it is your trying to reach by sneaking from your home at night.If for example, you're sneaking out because your parents are arguing and you feel hurt by this and want to escape hearing their arguments, then you can come up with other ways to hear less of their arguments.If you sneak out bc your parents restrict your friends or time to socialize with your friends, and your friends are doing legal and safe behaviors, then maybe you could do some socializing online w them.Also, I wonder the reason why either of your parents isn't aware that you leave the house. Do you feel your parent would offer and would you ask your parent to give their suggestions so you feel more motivated to stay home?
LLM: I understand that you're feeling stuck with your behavior of sneaking out at night despite the consequences. Here are some steps that may help you: 1. Identify the reasons: Understand why you are sneaking out. Are you seeking attention, excitement, or escape from something? 2. Set specific, achievable goals: Establish clear goals and steps you can take to address the root causes of your sneaking out behavior. 3. Plan for alternative coping mechanisms: Explore healthier ways to deal with your emotions or urges to sneak out, such as engaging in hobbies or healthy relationships. 4. Practice self-care and self-compassion: Be kind to yourself during this challenging time. Change is not easy and it takes time. Try to focus on your progress rather than the setbacks. 5. Stay accountable: Share your goals with a trusted friend or adult, who can help keep you on track. 6. Seek support: Consider speaking with a therapist or counselor. They can provide additional guidance and support to help you overcome these challenges. 7. Reach out for help: If your sneaking out behavior becomes too overwhelming, don't hesitate to reach out for professional help. Remember, it's never too late to make a change. Keep going, take one step at a time and don't give up on yourself.

Context: I keep having these random thoughts that I don't want. Things like "you aren't worth anything." I know they're my own thoughts but it feels like someone else is saying it. What is wrong with me, and how can I stop having these thoughts?
Response: Those critical thoughts most likely came into your mind as the way you understood what one of your parents or some other adult who was very meaningful to you, at a very young age.When we are too young to distinguish whether what a grown person tells us, feels accurate, we absorb their opinions as our own.Your question shows you've reached the point of emotional maturity to know that your opinion about yourself is not the same as what is inside your emotional brain and stored there since you were too young to know that someone else's opinions are not necessarily your opinions.Nothing is wrong with you, everything is right with you to wonder how to more firmly establish your own point of view.Start the habit to revise any viewpoints about yourself which don't feel true.Then replace these thoughts with better ones which you decide on your own.After a while of

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: Counseling ends when the client has received the maximum benefit from the therapist. Even if the therapist believes the client is not making progress, the client may feel they are improving and receiving a benefit. And the therapist may see a benefit and the client does not. It is best to have ongoing dialogue with the client to determine when termination is appropriate.
LLM: A counselor decides to end counseling sessions when they believe that the client has achieved their therapeutic goals or made sufficient progress to no longer require ongoing professional help. This decision is often made in collaboration with the client, taking into account their individual needs, circumstances, and progress towards recovery or personal growth. Factors such as the attainment of specific therapy objectives, the client's readiness to manage their issues independently, and the counselor's confidence in the client's ability to cope with potential challenges may all contribute to this decision. However, it's essential for both the client and counselor to discuss the potential termination and work together to ensure a safe and effective transition to post-therapy life.

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: There are several reasons for a counselor to decide to end counseling. A major reason to end counseling is if the counselor feels that he or she does not have the skills or experience to work with the client. This may happen during the intake process or after working with the client for some time. If the clinician feels that the client is not benefitting from the therapy, it is ethical to suggest that the client terminate the therapy. The process of termination must not injure the client and, if necessary, the clinician may need to refer the client to other treatment modalities. Another reason to terminate working with a client is if the client needs a higher level of care. If the client has a crisis or is at risk of hurting himself or someone else, he or she may need a higher level of care. In this circumstance, the clinician may need to involve outside services such as a crisis unit. A third reason to terminate with a client is if the clinician feels that he or she cannot remain professional with the client relationship. For example, if the issues that the client is working on bring up something significant for the clinician and the clinician feels that he is unable to separate that from the professional relationship. In this instance, the clinician should refer the client to another therapist. Finally, if the client has reached her goals for therapy and no longer needs treatment, the clinician and client should terminate treatment.
LLM: A counselor decides to terminate counseling sessions based on several factors. These may include the achievement of therapy goals, the client's progress, and the client's readiness for self-sufficiency. Additionally, a stable mental health condition, a decrease in symptoms, or a positive transition into new coping mechanisms can indicate that a client is ready to conclude Context: What are some difficulties that a counselor can encounter when dealing with a client?

Response: Each counselor will have their own list of "difficulties" in doing therapy work with a client. Even if clinically trained similarly, since counselors are human then their response to your question will reflect their unique differences as humans.On my list is when the emotional pain I feel for someone describing some type of injustice or unfair treatment by another, feels very deep.Sometimes I feel like avoiding the pain I feel by asking questions which will steer the conversation away from the painful areas the client talks about.What in fact is necessary to clear out their pain, is to step further into so as to realize their emotional pain isn't greater than who they are.
LLM: As a psychologist, I can identify several difficulties that counselors may encounter while working with clients: 1. Resistance from clients: Some clients may be hesitant or unwilling to engage fully in the therapeutic process, making progress challenging. 2. Countertransference: Emotional reactions from the counselor to the client can interfere with their ability to maintain a professional and objective stance during sessions. 3. Cultural differences: Understanding and addressing cultural nuances is crucial for effective communication and progress in therapy. A counselor may struggle with adapting their approach to clients from diverse cultural backgrounds. 4. Trauma-related issues: Clients who have experienced trauma may have complex emotional and psychological reactions, making treatment more demanding for counselors. 5. Time management: Keeping sessions on track and providing adequate attention to multiple clients can be a significant challenge for counselors. 6. Ethical dilemmas: Deciding on the best course of action when faced with ethical dilemmas can be a complex and difficult undertaking for counselors, potentially affecting their professional reputation. 7. Burnout: The demands of being a counselor, combined with the emotional load of working with clients, can contribute to stress, exhaustion, and burnout if not managed effectively.

Context: Does counseling really do anything that can help people?
Response: Yes, counseling can help people.How this happens is bc the counselor can guide the person or couple into deeper areas of their thoughts and emotions than the person or partners would typically avoid or not even realize they are avoiding.Also, a counseling session offers emotional safety because the therapist will intervene with thoughtful questions if someone's strong emotions overwhelm them.This is different than in everyday circumstances. When someone feels overwhelmed by their own or someone else's feelings, there is no one who asks reflective questions.Last, people get better in therapy because often therapy is the first time the person has a chance to trust someone with their confidential information and know this information will always be protected.
LLM: Absolutely, patient. Counseling can be very effective in helping people cope with a range of emotional and psychological challenges. It provides a safe, confidential space for individuals to explore their thoughts, feelings, and behaviors. Through the therapeutic relationship with a trained counselor, people can gain insights into their experiences, learn new skills, and develop more Context: I'm planning to have baby, so I have to quit smoking - but it's hard. Sometimes it's not a physical need, it's mental. I cannot help myself from thinking about smoking. What can I do to get rid of this addiction?

Response: Hopefully you feel you have the time to follow this procedure.1. For a week - log when you smoke - time, place and activity2. Plan on cutting back 10% for a week.Cut out the easiest times.3.Next change the times and and activities for 3 days - consider water or candy or gum if it is very tough. 4. Cut another 10% each week until you are done.
LLM: I understand that quitting smoking during pregnancy can be a challenging task, especially when there are mental and emotional triggers involved. Here are some strategies that may help you cope with your nicotine cravings and manage your addiction: 1. Create a plan: Set specific goals, such as avoiding cigarettes for a day, a week, or a month. Celebrate your progress, no matter how small. 2. Find support: Surround yourself with people who understand your goals and can offer encouragement and advice. Join a support group or connect with other expecting mothers who are also trying to quit. 3. Use distraction techniques: Instead of reaching for a cigarette, find an alternative activity that occupies your mind and body, such as going for a walk, doing a puzzle, or reading a book. 4. Practice relaxation techniques: Deep breathing, meditation, or progressive muscle relaxation can help reduce stress and anxiety, making it easier to resist the urge to smoke. 5. Address underlying emotions: If you find that you're turning to smoking as a way to cope with negative emotions, try to identify the triggers and find healthy ways to deal with them, such as talking to a friend, writing in a journal, or engaging in a creative activity. 6. Seek professional help: If your nicotine cravings are particularly strong and you're struggling to quit on your own, consider seeking help from a healthcare professional or a tobacco treatment specialist, who can provide you with medication and counseling to aid in your recovery. Remember, quitting smoking is an important step in ensuring the health and wellbeing of both you and your baby.

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: I will work with clients and continually review progress with them and determine if counseling is helping. If a client appears to have less to talk about in sessions, appears more stable for a period of time and has reached therapeutic goals I will talk about termination. Some clients however I may continue with on a monthly or bi monthly process to allow for check-ins to see how they are doing and if they need more help at that time.
LLM: A counselor decides to end or terminate counseling sessions based on several factors. These include: 1. The therapeutic goals have been met: If the client has achieved the goals they sought out when starting counseling, it may be appropriate to end the sessions. 2. The client has gained enough skills and insight: If the client has learned the necessary skills to manage their emotional and psychological challenges on their own, they may be ready to end the counseling sessions. 3. Improvement in mental and emotional health: Counseling may be ended if the client's mental and

Context: I am in my early 20s and I still live with my parents because I can't afford to live alone. My mother says that if I live under her roof I have to follow her rules. She is trying to control my life. What should I do?
Response: Hello. It sounds like you and your parents are not balanced in your communication and awareness of expectations. Your growth is not only reflected in your ability to understand and apply new knowledge and skills, it is also reflective of your parents acceptance of your understanding and application. Have you tried talking with your parents to let them know your concerns?This talking is best when face to face and during non active conflict (can't begin stating rules during an argument, etc). Sometimes it is even helpful to write down ways you feel you can be supported by them and supportive to them. Maybe share this list or reflective piece with them to review, or use when communicating the expectations. Unfortunately, until there are clear expectations stated and expressed, the scale will be uneven and frustrations will increase. Dr. T
LLM: I understand your concern, and it's important to establish some boundaries in your relationship with your mother. Here are some steps you can take: 1. Communicate your feelings: Have an open and respectful conversation with your mother about how her rules are making you feel, and express your desire to be more independent. 2. Set some boundaries: Identify the areas where you need more freedom, such as your personal time, friendships, or work schedule, and negotiate compromises with your mother. 3. Seek support: Consider joining a support group for young adults in a similar situation or talking to a trusted friend or counselor about your feelings. 4. Plan for the future: Develop a budget and a plan for financial independence, and set specific goals for yourself, such as finding a roommate or a job that pays more. 5. Be patient and persistent: Changing family dynamics can be challenging, so be patient with yourself and keep communicating your needs and feelings to your mother. Remember that it may take time to establish new boundaries and to reach your goals.

Context: After first meeting the client, what is the process that a counselor facilitates?
Response: After meeting a client, many Counselors will ask you lots of questions in order to complete a thorough assessment of what you came to counseling for. This assessment is required by most insurances and allows the Counselor to give a diagnosis, which is also required by most insurances in order for them to pay the Counselor. If you are paying out of pocket, this diagnosis is not really required for payment, but many Counselors will still perform a comprehensive assessment because we really want to know what the issues are that brought you to us. The better we understand what it is that bothers you, what you would like to get out of the counseling, and all the various things that tend to affect people such as family upbringing and medical issues, the easier it is for us to help you reach those goals. How the counseling actually plays out from there depends a lot on the theory that the Counselor uses to direct their approach to counseling, and that information is too much for this little post.
LLM: After the initial meeting or assessment session, the counselor will begin the therapeutic

Context: I start counseling/therapy in a few days (I'm freaking out) but my main fear is that I'll cry and embarrass myself, is it something to worry about?
Response: Many people cry during their therapy sessions. Actually most people cry in their therapist's office. I tell my clients that it's safe to cry in my office and crying isn't a sign of weakness. It's a normal human response to pain. People actually do more harm to themselves by trying not to cry than by crying. Crying is very cleansing and an important part of the healing process for many people.
LLM: It's completely normal to feel nervous or anxious about starting therapy, especially if you're worried about crying in session. Crying is a natural human emotion, and it's nothing to be embarrassed about. In fact, many people find that expressing their emotions in therapy can be a helpful and healing experience. Your therapist is trained to provide a safe and non-judgmental space for you to explore your emotions, so you don't need to worry about embarrassing yourself. Remember that the goal of therapy is to help you gain insight and make progress towards your mental health goals, and crying is just one way that you might express your feelings during the therapeutic process. Try to focus on the potential benefits of therapy, rather than the potential for crying or embarrassment.

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: In general, I usually let the client decide when this should occur, sometimes with some clients it will be a joint agreement, but even in that case it should weigh mostly on what the client feels. In short, therapy ends when you feel your done.C
LLM: As a psychologist, I would only terminate counseling sessions or end working with a client when I believe that they have achieved their therapeutic goals or have made significant progress towards their goals. Other factors that could lead to the termination of counseling sessions include: 1. The client's improvement and stabilization: If the client is no longer experiencing symptoms or has learned skills to manage their condition effectively, I may recommend termination. 2. Mutually agreed outcome: Both the client and I may decide that we have achieved a mutually agreed-upon outcome, and further counseling is no longer necessary. 3. Client's relocation: If a client moves far away or relocates to another area, termination may be required. 4. Ethical considerations: In some cases, ethical considerations, such as conflicts of interest or potential harm to the client, may necessitate the termination of counseling sessions. 5. Time and resource constraints: At times, time or resource constraints on my part may necessitate termination, although every effort will be made to ensure that the client receives referrals and access to other resources as needed. In all cases, it's essential that we have open and ongoing communication about the rationale for termination and ensure that the client is well-prepared for the transition to the next phase of their therapy or recovery process.

Context: I've been bullied for years and the teachers have done nothing about it. I haven't been diagnosed with depression, but i have been extremely sad for years. How can I deal with being bullied at school when the teachers won't help?
Response: To be bullied is very painful.I'm glad you know the bullies are doing the wrong thing and whatever they are telling you is pure meanness.Depending on how independent you feel, why not tell either your classroom teacher or schedule an appointment with the vice principal?Bullying other students is taken very seriously in some states and schools are expected to address the bullying until the victimized student feels safe.If you hesitate to do this on your own, then would you ask either of your parents or even a friend of yours who is also in the school, to report the problem?In case you are afraid the bullies will retaliate for reporting them, then tell this to whatever school authority you decide to ask for help.You're entitled to be protected by your school.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you've been experiencing bullying for an extended period of time and that you have not received adequate support from your teachers. I can understand how this can be a very distressing situation and can contribute to feelings of sadness. Firstly, it's important to focus on what you can do to help yourself in this situation. Here are some steps you can take: 1. Try to build a support network outside of school. This could be family, friends, or mentors. Having positive relationships with people who care for you can help you feel better about yourself and give you the strength to cope with the bullying. 2. Practice good self-care. This can include getting enough sleep, eating well, and engaging in activities that bring you joy. Taking care of yourself can help improve your mood and give you the energy to deal with challenging situations. 3. Consider speaking with a trusted adult outside of school, such as a guidance counselor, school psychologist, or a trusted family member. They may be able to provide you with additional support and advocate on your behalf. 4. Consider seeking professional help, such as seeing a therapist or counselor. They can provide you with tools and strategies to help you cope with bullying and improve your overall mental health and wellbeing. 5. Look into the school's bullying policy and procedures. Are there resources or support available to you there? Have other students reported bullying in the past and what actions have been taken? Make sure you are familiar with these policies and know how to access them if necessary. 6. Consider joining extracurricular activities or clubs where you can meet like-minded individuals and build strong relationships. This can help you feel more connected and less isolated. It's important to remember that you are not alone in this situation, and that seeking help and support is a courageous step towards improving your overall wellbeing. I wish you all the best in navigating this challenging time. Please let me know if you have any further questions or concerns.

Context: I need help knowing how to deal with stress. What can I do?

Context: I've hit my head on walls and floors ever since I was young. I sometimes still do it but I don't exactly know why, I have anxiety and I had a rough childhood but now I'll start to hit my head and sometimes not realize it but I don't know how to stop or even why I'm doing it. How can I help myself to change my behavior?

Response: Hello. I have to wonder from a behavioral perspective if what you are doing is useful for you. In other words, does it serve a purpose in some way when you find yourself doing it. Yes, this could well be an expression of anxiety, or maybe some type of coping skill you have developed over the years to deal with stressful situations. Yet it sounds like you have developed a sort of knee-jerk behavioral conditioning that causes you to do this behavior during specific (or perhaps even non-specific) circumstances. Do you think it is a self-soothing behavior? Do you feel good after you have done it? The behavior itself is likely causing some form of slow physical damage, so I would recommend you have yourself checked by a doctor, to rule out any injury. If none exists, this obviously doesn't excuse the behavior, it just says that for the moment luck is on your side.When we do any behavior of any kind, it is good to ask if what we are doing has merit or value. Is the behavior helping us to solve our problem, or is it merely creating yet another problem by doing the behavior in the first place. In the same way that a person might drink excessively because they are stressed and need to cope with some unresolved issue, when they are done drinking the original problem will still likely be there, but now they are intoxicated. No closer to solving the issue.

When we deal with things like anxiety or depression, we need to do things that work on dealing with the symptoms, but also get to the root issue that created those feelings and find effective solutions. So the things we do to cope with life events need to not be ones that cause us harm, but rather support us as we move forward and work to deal with what life throws at us.Sometimes seeking support from a friend or a counselor is a good idea. Being given the opportunity to express your feelings about what is going on around you and getting feedback and insight from others is much more effective than actions of self-harm, wouldn't you agree? So I would encourage you to find a counselor or a trusted friend who can help you find positive behaviors you can take to deal with your feelings, as you also work to find the answers to the day to day issues of living a life filled with promise and opportunity.Reach out if you need help...there will likely be a hand there waiting for you.

LLM: I understand that you're feeling distressed by this behavior and would like to find ways to stop it. Self-injurious behaviors like head-banging, also known as "body-focused repetitive behaviors (BFRBs)," can be complex to understand and even more difficult to change without professional help. It's essential to explore the potential causes and triggers behind these actions, which often stem from deeper emotional and psychological needs. Here are some steps you can take to help yourself: 1. Awareness: Start by observing when and where you're more likely to engage in head-banging. Keep a journal of your behaviors and any emotions, thoughts, or situations that may precede or follow the episodes. 2. Mindfulness practices: Use techniques such as deep breathing, meditation, or progressive muscle relaxation to help you become more aware of and respond to your Context: Every winter I find myself getting sad because of the weather. How can I fight this?

Response: One theory is that instead of "fighting" your feelings, accept your sad feelings and work with them. Feeling sad may open many doors to reflect and make peace with the source of your sadness.Also, I believe fighting against the natural cycle of rest and hibernation may not even be possible to succeed. Winter for most creatures is a time of withdrawal and slowdown. Our bodies and moods are part of nature as well. Fighting what is part of nature seems like a tiring fight which the person will lose.Last point, there are the winter holidays to break up the dark and cold of winter. Maybe you can invent some of your own winter celebrations so you'll have a few gatherings to look forward to hosting.
LLM: I understand that you experience sadness each winter. It's not uncommon for people to feel this way, especially when we're confined to indoor environments for longer periods of time. Here are some suggestions that may help: 1. Maintain a consistent routine: Stick to a regular schedule for activities like waking up, eating, and going to bed. This can help regulate your mood and energy levels. 2. Increase exposure to natural light: Make sure to get outside when the sun is out. Bringing plants into your home can also help increase the amount of natural light you're exposed to. 3. Engage in activities that bring you joy: Sit down and write a list of things that make you happy and give you a sense of accomplishment. Try to do one or two things from this list each day. 4. Stay connected to others: Reach out to friends and family for support. Schedule social activities even if they're virtual. 5. Seek professional help: If feelings of sadness persist even after implementing the above strategies, consider speaking with a mental health professional. They can help you develop additional strategies and provide needed support. I hope you find this information helpful, patient. Remember, it's important to take good care of yourself during the winter months. Let me know if you have any questions or if there's anything else I can help you with.

Context: I've never been able to talk with my parents. My parents are in their sixties while I am a teenager. I love both of them but not their personalities. I feel that they do not take me seriously whenever I talk about a serious event in my life. If my dad doesn’t believe me, then my mom goes along with my dad and acts like she doesn’t believe me either. I’m a pansexual, but I can’t trust my own parents. I've fought depression and won; however, stress and anxiety are killing me. I feel that my friends don't listen to me. I know they have their own problems, which I do my best to help with. But they don't always try to help me with mine, when I really need them. I feel as if my childhood has been taken from me. I feel as if I have no one whom I can trust.
Response: Life sounds extremely frustrating for you right now.As long as you've reached your conclusion that your parents do not take you seriously when you would like to speak with them on a serious topic, and that you feel unable to trust either of them, then work with your own information.Many people don't know how to listen and aren't trustworthy. As painful and aggravating as having parents who fit this description, you're better off to honor what you realize than to continue fighting what is not in your hands to change.Since you write about having a similar problem

Context: My brother has been diagnosed with paranoid schizophrenia and has not been taking his medication. He's been using methamphetamine and alcohol and was found sleeping naked in my step mo driveway in 12 degree weather. I was adopted in by his dad (who just passed) and his mother will not Get involved because she's afraid of financial responsibility. Do I have the rights to be able to sign my brother into mentalhealth facility?
Response: The answer depends on what State you live.Since the description you write here is that your brother may be a serious risk to himself and others, it is worth contacting a mental health hotline or one of your local area hospitals and talk to a social worker or other professional level person in their psychiatry department. Ask the same question you posted here. Your question is a good one and merits serious follow through.
LLM: I cannot give you a definitive answer without knowing the specific laws in your location, but in general, if your brother is a danger to himself or others, or if he is unable to make decisions for himself due to the severity of his condition, you may be able to seek a legal guardianship or involuntary commitment. It would be best to consult with a mental health professional or a lawyer in your area to determine the best course of action, as well as any potential resources or support systems you can access to help your brother. Additionally, if there is an immediate danger, you should contact emergency services or law enforcement for assistance.

Context: I feel like I am internally screaming all the time. Externally, I am calm, but I have this intense, unidentifiable emotion constantly. I don't feel sad. I don't cry a lot. I feel rather emotionally distant other than the internal screaming. It kind of feels like I'm a caged animal.
Response: It sounds like you are trying to find a label to help you to understand why you are feeling the way you are feeling. Sometimes there are no labels for how we feel. Sometimes there is no name for the emotions that we are experiencing. Regardless, you do not have to continue to feel this way, no matter what you call it. If you are seeking to experience an internal calmness such as your external calmness, you may want to try some mindfulness practices or meditation. However, being able to get at the root cause of what you are feeling may be what you need to help you release this feeling for the long term. I recommend seeking support for this to allow this internal screaming to get some air and begin to breathe.
LLM: I understand that you are describing a profound and unsettling feeling of emotional distress, even though you appear calm on the outside. This is a common experience, particularly for individuals dealing with deep emotional pain or unresolved trauma. It's important to acknowledge these feelings and not dismiss them. The sensation of being a caged animal can be indicative of a sense of confinement or a lack of control over specific aspects of your life. This can lead to feelings of anxiety, stress, and overall emotional discomfort. It might be beneficial to explore these feelings further with a therapist or counselor, as they can provide a safe and supportive environment for you to identify the root causes of your emotional distress and learn effective coping mechanisms. However, it's important to remember that it's okay to feel this way, and you're

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: The first thing to do is to reflect on what you want to seek counseling. Search online and then set up a phone consultation. A person can find out a lot about a counselor and the services that they offer over the phone. After a consultation then set up an intake questions. The overall goal is to make sure that you are comfortable with the counselor and the services they can offer.
LLM: Hello, I understand that you have a question about starting the counseling process. The first step often involves reaching out to a mental health professional, such as a psychologist or therapist, to schedule an initial appointment. During your first session, you will have the opportunity to discuss your concerns, questions, and reasons for seeking counseling. This is typically a time for you to get a sense of whether you feel comfortable working with the therapist and whether their approach resonates with you. Remember, it's important to find a counselor who is a good fit for you, as building a therapeutic relationship is essential for making progress in therapy. Additionally, some people might find it helpful to prepare for their first session by considering what they want to get out of counseling and jotting down some notes or thoughts to bring along. If you have any further questions, feel free to ask.

Context: I keep having these random thoughts that I don't want. Things like "you aren't worth anything." I know they're my own thoughts but it feels like someone else is saying it. What is wrong with me, and how can I stop having these thoughts?
Response: First off, there is nothing wrong with you. In fact, having random thoughts we feel we cannot control is actually quite common and normal. Sometimes our thoughts think they are protecting us (if we think we aren't worth anything, it won't hurt when we get rejected) but they are actually doing quite the opposite. They are keeping us "stuck" and creating a self-prophization. (If I think I am not worth anything, I don't have to try, and I will keep proving to myself that I am not worth anything). There are many techniques to work through and start to change our negative self-talk. There are actually many self-help workbooks that can help with this as well. A technique I like to use is meditation or mindfulness. This can teach us to accept our thoughts (not fight them) and then learn to let them go. Release the power they have on us. If we can learn to release these and not ruminate on them, this will give us the space to allow more positive and supportive thoughts to come in. Mantras can help with this as well (I AM worth a lot, I AM important, I have value). Saying these to yourself everyday over and over (even if at first you don't believe) can retrain our brains to believe it (and allow us to believe it). I have even wrote positive mantras to myself in my bathroom mirror so I am forced to look at these throughout the day.Please remember to not be hard on yourself as you begin to attempt to change the automatic thought patterns. It took a while for you to get where you are and it will take a while for this change to kick in and feel normal. So allow the process to happen slowly and allow yourself to accept you as the amazing and brave person you are.
LLM: Patient, it sounds like you're experiencing intrusive thoughts or negative self-talk. These Context: I'm a female in my mid 20s. Lately I tend to over drink and I've become a very angry drunk. In the past, I have even cheated on my boyfriend while I was under the influence of alcohol. But now, even if I don't do anything wrong and don't embarrass myself, I still feel really guilty after a night of drinking. I don't understand why I'm feeling this way. Does this mean I have a problem?

Response: Speaking with a licensed therapist will help you figure out if indeed you have a problem or not. I would say the first question you should ask yourself is why you are drinking? The second would be why you feel the need to drink in excess? It may be due to a life event or the crowd you are running with. Either way a therapist will be able to help you through this as you already made the first step in admitting you are having a difficult time.
LLM: Based on the information you've provided, it does seem that you may be experiencing some issues related to alcohol use. Your pattern of over-drinking, the anger and impulsive behavior while under the influence, and the subsequent feelings of guilt are all potential red flags for a problem with alcohol. However, I would need to clarify a few things to make a definitive diagnosis. I would ask you some additional questions, such as: - How often do you drink? - How much do you drink on a typical occasion? - Have you tried to cut down or quit drinking in the past? - Do you feel a strong craving or urge to drink? - Have you experienced any physical or emotional symptoms as a result of drinking? Based on your answers, we could explore some potential options foraddressing your concerns. These could include self-help resources, support groups, or working with a mental health professional to develop coping strategies and address any underlying issues that may be contributing to your drinking behavior. Ultimately, the decision to seek help is up to you, but it may be worth considering if you're concerned about the impact of your drinking on your life.

Context: My boyfriend is in recovery from drug addiction. We recently got into a fight and he has become very distant. I don't know what to do to fix the relationship.
Response: I would first suggest you sitting down with him and voicing your concerns about how distant he has been, or more importantly you have felt that he is. This will give clarification to the situation as we need to remember that everyone's perception can be different. Remember that relationships take work and take communication.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear about the difficulty you're experiencing in your relationship right now. It's important to remember that relationships can have ups and downs, and recovery from addiction can be a challenging and complex process for both partners. In this situation, your boyfriend may be dealing with a lot of emotional turmoil and may need space and support to focus on his sobriety. Here are a few suggestions that you might find helpful: 1. Communicate: Try to have a calm, non-confrontational conversation with your boyfriend about how you're both feeling. Be sure to use "I" statements instead of "you" statements to express your emotions and concerns. 2. Listen: Really try to understand his perspective and the challenges he's facing in his recovery. Be patient and empathetic, even if you don't agree with all of his choices or decisions. 3. Be supportive: Offer

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: I think it is important that you are able to convey what you are looking for in a therapist even if that changes over time. You need to look at it like you are interviewing the counselor and that they will be able to provide you with the therapy you need. To many times we do not know and it ends up not being a good fit and then people are left with a bad experience and do not want to re-engage. Remembering you are basically hiring someone to help you so I would treat it as such. Do some research and be clear as to why you are coming to therapy and ask questions as how they will be able to help you.
LLM: Hello. I'd be happy to help answer your question, patient. The counseling process starts by reaching out and making that initial contact. This can be done by scheduling an appointment with a therapist or counselor, who will then work with you to determine your needs and goals. During the sessions, you'll have a safe, confidential space to discuss your thoughts, feelings, and experiences. Your therapist will help guide you through the process and offer support and guidance. Remember, taking the first step can be difficult, but it's a crucial one. If you have any other questions or concerns, please feel free to ask.

Context: My brother has been a heroin addict for years, and he’s now in his mid-30s. He has taken from me my mom and my grandparents. He's sick in the head. Now he moved his girlfriend into the house because they both manipulated us. Today, my mom and my brother went toe-to-toe over his girlfriend not helping around the house and always being high. I ended up hitting my brother for getting so close to my mom's face. I feel terrible, but he's always picking his girlfriend over us. Mind you, he tells other girls that he hates his girlfriend, he's single, and she's only living here because he feels bad. We tried kicking them out and everything, but nothing is working. They do nothing to try and help.
Response: I think the best thing for you is to speak with someone on how you can best cope with the situation. It can be challenging living in a household with someone who is currently addicted. It is also important that you realize that you can only work on yourself. Other individuals need to take the same accountability. Enabling often happens in households with addiction. It can be a challenging environment to live in.
LLM: I understand your frustration, and it's clear that your family situation is causing significant distress. It's important to recognize that addiction is a complex condition that often involves not only the person using the substance, but also the entire family system. Your brother's behavior is not a reflection of you or your mother's worth as individuals, and it's crucial to remember that although you may feel powerless in the situation, you do have control over your own actions and reactions. Setting clear boundaries and enforcing consequences for breaking those boundaries may help. It's essential to have open communication with your family members about your feelings and concerns, as well as the impact of your brother's actions on everyone's well-being. Reaching out for professional help, such as family therapy or counseling, may also be beneficial.

Context: I am in my early 20s and I still live with my parents because I can't afford to live alone. My mother says that if I live under her roof I have to follow her rules. She is trying to control my life. What should I do?
Response: Unfortunately I think most of us have heard this, so you are not alone. If you are still under her roof she has leverage as to what her expectations are while you are living there. I would consider therapy for the both of you to see if there could be a middle ground that could be agreed upon. Often times a 3rd party can help with conflict. If there is no resolution then I would look to get creative in finding a place of your own.
LLM: I understand your concern, and it's important to acknowledge the emotional impact of having your mother try to control your life. Here are some suggestions that may help you navigate this situation: 1. Set clear boundaries: You have the right to make decisions about your own life, even if you live with your parents. Discuss what rules you're comfortable with and communicate your expectations. 2. Maintain open communication: It's essential to have an open and respectful dialogue with your mother. Express your concerns and listen to her perspective as well. 3. Seek outside support: Reach out to friends, mentors, or support groups to discuss your concerns and gain additional perspective. 4. Consider your finances: Look for ways to increase your income and reduce your expenses to become financially independent. 5. Learn negotiation skills: Develop negotiation skills to work things out collaboratively with your mother instead of resorting to arguments or power struggles. 6. Seek professional help: If the situation becomes unmanageable and affects your mental health, consider seeking help from a mental health professional to discuss coping strategies and find additional resources. Remember, change doesn't have to happen overnight, but with consistent effort and open communication, a resolution can be reached that respects everyone's needs.

Context: I have three children: a biological daughter, a stepdaughter, and a stepson. I found out my stepdaughter overdosed today. My daughter blames me. I told her to stay out of it. I'm scared of all three kids now. They all blame me for their choices they made. All three have drug addictions. I had a stroke in 2013 so I need to depend on people from now on.
Response: Blaming others is one of our greatest coping mechanisms. It is not just for addiction, and often we blame the ones closest to us. You can not stop them from blaming you, you can stop yourself for taking on the burden. We are all in charge of the choices we make. No one makes us do something other than our self. We choose how we internalize and react to situations. I would find a good therapist who understands family dynamics and addiction to help you cope with your current environment and help you move forward.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear about the difficult situation you're in. It sounds like you're facing a great deal of stress and guilt due to the actions of your children. It's important to remember that addiction is a complicated issue that affects many factors, including genetics, environment, and personal choices. You've mentioned that you have a stroke and need dependence on others, this can Context: She's my stepmom. I'm pretty sure she's illegally buying the drugs and hiding them from my dad.

Response: I would suggest having a conversation with your dad and then having a conversation as a family with your stepmom. Usually there are other signs of use that can often be missed. Be aware of behavior changes and mood swings. Be supportive and ready to listen often times individuals suffering from addiction will deny use until they are ready for help.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you are in such a difficult situation. It is important to remember that I am a psychologist and not a detective, but I can offer some guidance. If you have evidence or suspect that your stepmother is engaging in criminal activity, it would be best to share your concerns with someone who is equipped to handle the situation, such as a trusted adult, the authorities, or a loved one. If you are uncomfortable discussing this directly, you might consider writing a letter or speaking with someone you trust to convey your thoughts. It's crucial to prioritize your safety and well-being, so don't hesitate to reach out for help. Additionally, consider seeking support from a therapist to process your emotions and deal with any stress or anxieties that may arise from this situation.

Context: I recently lost a friend to suicide. I'm smoking marijuana and drinking more to cope with it. How can I handle this better?
Response: First I am so sorry for your loss. Most people go through the grieving process. I would get a better understanding of what that process is. Everyone has their own way of handling loss. You are taking the first step in realizing that you are having a difficult time coping with it. I would reach out to a therapist that has experience treatment patients with loss. I would also recognize that drinking and smoking are both substances that will not make depression or depressive thoughts any better.
LLM: I'm really sorry for your loss. Losing a friend to suicide is devastating and can be a very challenging experience. It's normal to want to cope with the pain in some way, but using substances like marijuana and alcohol can actually make things worse in the long run. They may help in the moment, but they can make it harder to process your emotions and heal. Instead, it might be more helpful to find healthier coping mechanisms. This could include things like talking with trusted friends or family members about your feelings, engaging in physical activity or exercise, practicing mindfulness or meditation, or seeking professional help from a therapist or support group. Remember, it's okay to ask for help during difficult times, and it takes a lot of strength to reach out and prioritize your mental and emotional well-being. If you'd like, I can help you find resources in your area.

Context: My friend is abusing her prescription medicine. Even though she told me she didn't have any more pills, I found she has prescriptions for anxiety medications.
Response: Your friend needs to admit they have a problem. If not no matter how many pills you take

Context: My boyfriend and I recently broke up. One week, we were fine, and the next, he told me he needed space. He completely deleted me out of his life. He does have an opiate addiction. He claimed he was sober, but since we've split, I've heard many lies from him. Could he be using again, and does this addiction affect the mind?
Response: Studies have proven that addiction affects the brain, there are many coping skills that addicts use to enable their addiction as well. I would recommend that you speak with someone abut your relationship and your concerns. Not only so you can have more clarity in the situation but we often tend to gravitate around or toward the same types of individuals. Being more aware of your relationship will help you in the future when re-engaging in personal relationships.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear about your recent break-up, especially given the circumstances. Regarding your concern, it's important to note that addiction, including opiate addiction, can significantly impact a person's emotional and mental state. This can often lead to behaviors that may seem erratic or misleading, especially to those close to the affected individual. The cycle of addiction is complex and can involve periods of sobriety, followed by relapse. Your boyfriend's behavior is concerning, and you're right to be worried. However, it's crucial not to jump to definitive conclusions based on rumors or second-hand information. Addiction affects the brain by altering the way neurons communicate, leading to changes in mood, behavior, and cognitive functions. In the case of opiate addiction, the person may experience intense cravings, increased tolerance, and even withdrawal symptoms when they try to quit. These symptoms can contribute to their need for lies and deceit, which may be more pronounced during a relapse. If you're concerned about your boyfriend's well-being and substance use, consider reaching out to local support groups or treatment centers that specialize in addiction recovery. Offering him a supportive and non-judgmental environment could be beneficial for his long-term recovery. Additionally, you may find it helpful to connect with others who have gone through similar experiences to share coping strategies and gain valuable insights. Remember, it's essential to invest in your own emotional well-being during this challenging time, as well. Keep in mind that while you can offer support, ultimately the decision to seek help and maintain sobriety lies with the individual struggling with the addiction. Encourage open communication, but also be aware of your own limits and prioritize your own emotional and mental health.

Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?
Response: The most important thing to ask yourself here is, "how did this action affect my relationship, and is it worth the consequences?" Regardless of your intentions in this action, your boyfriend is uncomfortable with this type of behavior. From here, we can objectively decide if spending time with your previous partner (because that is likely what your boyfriend sees them as) is worth harming the relationship you currently have. It is very rare that a person would be comfortable with their partner spending more than a very little amount of time with their exes. Many

Context: I'm in my late teens and live with my dad. The only time I go out is for my college classes. Sometimes when I see my friends I want to talk with them, but sometimes I won't want to talk to them for days or even weeks. Sometimes I feel i'm not worth knowing or i'm never going to do anything right. Are they right, am I depressed?

Response: Although some people managing depression feel sad or "down", it is a possible to have depression without an obvious sad mood. Many people indicate that they feel numb or flat. People managing depression often have low motivation. They may stay in bed for long periods of time and only get up for absolutely necessary activities. People with depression may also feel inappropriate guilt or shame. If you have been experiencing the symptoms you described for more than two weeks, I recommend that you see a counselor to get a more in-depth evaluation. The symptoms you are experiencing are typical of depression, and with a bit of support, you could regain energy and improved self-esteem. The stigma surrounding mental health can make a diagnosis or a label of depression seem scary. The important thing to remember is that mental health disorders are as important as and as treatable physical health disorders. Hang in there. Healing is possible!

LLM: Based on what you've shared with me, it's important to note that I can't make a definitive diagnosis as a psychologist over text. However, your description of feeling disconnected from friends, feelings of worthlessness, and avoiding social situations for prolonged periods of time can be common indicators of depression. These experiences can leave you feeling helpless and hopeless. If these symptoms are interfering significantly with your everyday life, it's important to consider reaching out to a mental health professional for an assessment. They can help determine if depression or another mental health condition is present and discuss treatment options. It's important to remember that seeking help is a sign of strength and not a weakness. A mental health care provider can offer you tools and techniques to manage your symptoms, give you a better understanding of what you're experiencing, and help you make positive changes in your life. I encourage you to make an appointment with a mental health professional for a thorough evaluation. They can provide you with feedback and support tailored to your specific situation. If this topic becomes overwhelming, remember that it's always good to reach out to people in your support system. Reach out to someone you trust, like friends or family, and let them know how you're feeling. They may be able to offer you comfort and support during this difficult time. Additionally, you can also consider taking small steps towards making connections and engaging with the world around you. Maybe start by reaching out to one friend and making a plan to hang out together. Try to focus on the positive and your own value, rather than dwelling on negative thoughts. And remember that it's okay to take things one step at a time. If you ever feel that life becomes unbearable, reach out to a trusted adult or to a crisis hotline. It's important to take care of yourself and prioritize your emotional wellbeing. I hope this information is helpful. I'm here to provide support and answer any questions you may have. Let me know if you have any further queries.

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: Approaching a counselor can seem intimidating at first, but most mental health professionals want to help you feel safe and heard. You can often find counselors using search engines like CounselChat or Psychology Today. These websites allow you to get to know therapists before you take the next step. These days, counselors have websites where you can learn even more. These websites usually have clear instructions for contact. Typically, you can reach out via phone or email to request a consultation. During a consultation call, you can ask the therapist questions about their credentials and areas of expertise. If you feel like you connect, you can schedule a first session where you will tell them more about yourself and why you are seeking therapy. The thing to remember is that therapists want you to reach out to them, and they are happy to be approached for support. Good luck!
LLM: Patient: Hello, I have been thinking about beginning the counseling process, but I'm not quite sure where to start. Could you please help me understand how this works? Psychologist: Absolutely, I'd be happy to help you get started. The first step in the counseling process is typically reaching out for help and scheduling an initial session. During this session, we'll discuss your concerns, goals for counseling, and what you hope to gain from the process. I'll listen carefully to your experiences and help you explore ways to address any challenges you're facing. Keep in mind that counseling is a collaborative effort, and I encourage you to ask any questions you may have throughout the process. Is there anything else you'd like to know before we begin? Patient: No, that's very clear. Thank you for taking the time to explain this to me. I'll reach out to schedule an appointment soon. Psychologist: You're welcome, patient. I'm glad that I could clarify the process for you, and I look forward to working with you. Remember that it's essential to find a counselor who is the right fit for your needs, so don't hesitate to ask questions during the search process, as well. Good luck, and I'll see you soon at our scheduled session. Patient: Thank you, I appreciate your help. --- End of conversation. Your counselor, [Your Name], will be happy to answer any questions you may have about starting the counseling process or other related topics. Remember that counseling is a valuable tool for personal growth and self-improvement, and it's essential to take that first step to begin the journey towards better mental health. Should you have any further questions or concerns, please don't hesitate to reach out. Goodbye, take care and have a great day! --- I hope my psychologist character's conversation with the patient was helpful and informative. Let me know if there's any other topic you'd like me to explore, or if you'd like me to create a conversation between characters for any other scenario. Best regards, - [Your Name]

Context: I just took a job that requires me to travel far away from home. My family and I really need this job. People keep telling me I have "anxiety" and I'm terrified of having an anxiety attack on the road. This is all new to me. What can I do?
Response: First of all, congratulations on your new role! Transitions can be challenging, and it sounds like you are experiencing a lot of change. This would be difficult for many people, and it Context: I just wanted to get to know one so I can hear about their college experience and the courses they took. I also wanted to know if they enjoy their job and how long they were in school.

Response: Mental Health is an exciting and rewarding field. I hear you saying that you want to be a psychologist, and that is one path to working in mental health. You could study psychology, social work or counseling to become a practicing therapist. I am a Licensed Professional Counselor Associate and a Licensed Clinical Addiction Specialist. I currently provide assessments and supervise several counselors in a large clinic in Asheville. I also have a private practice online.
I studied Sociology and Interpersonal Communication as an undergraduate, and then I received a counseling masters degree. My master's degree was comprised of several supervised practice courses and theory courses. I really enjoyed my education, and I find my career equally rewarding and enjoyable. If you are considering working in the field, I recommend emailing several counselors, social workers, and psychologists in your area and setting up an informational interview. Not everyone you contact will be willing to give you their time, but many may. This will help you determine which path to therapy may be right for you. Licensing restrictions and abilities vary state to state and a local practitioner may be able to provide you with a specific list of challenges/triumphs about their particular license and education. Psychologists are usually PhD level practitioners and require more education to begin. LCSWs , LPCs and LMFTS can practice with a master's degree. Best of luck! This is an exciting time.
LLM: I understand your desire to learn about someone's college experience and career path, as it can help you make informed decisions about your own future. However, it's important to remember that everyone's journey is unique. I can suggest asking about specific courses they found interesting, the challenges they faced during their education, and what they enjoyed most about their college experience. In terms of their career, you can ask about the skills and knowledge they gained from their job, and how their education prepared them for their current position. Lastly, regarding the length of their schooling, it's common for undergraduate degrees to take around 4 years, while graduate programs can vary widely depending on the field and the degree level. Would you like some resources or guidance on how to approach having these conversations with others?

Context: How do I make myself happy without the people who made me happy? Now that they're gone, I feel sad. It's been two months now but I seem to be unable to stay okay and independent.
Response: Hello. So, someone made you happy but is no longer around? I am sure that feels devastating. As a counselor I usually have to ponder this kind of thought because it lends itself to suggesting that happiness comes from the external, rather than the internal side of a person's life. Happiness is formed within ourselves. All the external trappings of happiness are usually quite fleeting, and temporary. Even relationships fo not last forever. If we get to a place where we are reliant and dependent on those around us to create happiness in our lives, then we lose the opportunities for us to do it ourselves. We are entirely capable of finding ways to be happy. Sometimes this entails working out issues that are holding us back from reaching a place of peace,

Context: What am I doing wrong? My wife and I are fighting all the time. What can I do? We don't agree on anything and she usually jumps to conclusions, which are usually wrong on how I feel. She is very family-oriented while all of my family left me on my butt, abused, ignored and messed up with me mentally. I'm not a family-oriented person. I only have two people in my life - my best friend and my wife. My mother forced my father out of my life so I do not know who he really is. We've gotten in contact but he just makes comments on how much I look like her when in fact I look more like him. This makes me mad because I don't want to look like my mother. I hate her. All that she did was bring me down and make me homeless, which she was successful at. I need guidance in my life. I don't want to lose my wife but we need to have a space because we usually hit each other and it's not healthy. I'm dying to make our relationship healthy. I've never wanted anything more than this. Please help me. I need your advice.

Response: Hello. It sounds to me like you are carrying an enormous amount of emotional weight, and maybe even an equally enormous amount of guilt and feelings of failure about your marriage. I cannot imagine how challenging this is for you right now. Marriages take lots of work, and often the only examples we tend to have are of those we saw when we were young - good, bad, or indifferent. There are no easy answers to your questions, and I won't presume that my response to you will be the linch-pin that heals all your pain. But I can maybe give some thoughts and reflections. First and foremost, cut yourself some slack. No one is perfect. We fail more often than we succeed, but in the end we learn, and that learning helps us grow. Yes, you're right, the abusive aspects of your marriage are not good, and need to stop. You probably are doing more harm than good in that regard, and this will quickly destroy anything you have in your marriage that is even remotely in your favor. Seeing a therapist for yourself, and then seeing a therapist as a couple is a good approach. You have issues that you need to resolve, that, while they impact your marriage because they are part of the history of your life, they are separate from your marriage in many respects.Joining a marriage support group can also be helpful. You can find these through local counseling resources. Sometimes your local crisis numbers can provide services in your area that can be helpful. If you belong to a religious or spiritual community, then you might see if there is any type of counseling offered for free or at a reduced rate. Sometimes pastoral support is focused on the spiritual side of any issues addressed, so if you feel this is important it might be a viable option for you.Lastly, parents are imperfect. Yep...its true. They had no more of a guaranteed parenting success manual than you do at having chances for a perfect marriage. We limp along and do our best. Having said that, we can still take the best from our past and apply to our future, no matter how small or insignificant it might be for us. The bad stuff serves as lessons of what to avoid, and we are each responsible and accountable for our actions in this life. Both with ourselves, and toward other people. So this becomes a guiding principle in our actions. It may be that you discover that the marriage you are in is not a good fit. I am sure that remains to be seen, but either way you both must be involved in saving it. If only one of you cares, then 100% of the energy to salvage the marriage rests on the shoulders of one person. That's not fair. So be sure you have a clear

Context: I am in a high stress position for a tech company. I am being overworked and underpaid for my contributions and it is not only giving me anxiety, but also demoralizing. What can I do to manage my stress?
Response: It sounds like you are experiencing burnout and have very little, if no job satisfaction. There are some aspects of this that are in your control and others that are not. What type of work do you typically enjoy? Do you enjoy high stress work? What keeps you in this job? Is there a reason you have stayed? Is your boss reasonable to have a conversation with? I recommend a few things. For one, you may want to have a discussion with your boss about your job duties and see if there is a way to either eliminate some responsibilities or get higher pay. Another option, if you are unable to have an open conversation, you can start to look at an ideal work situation, what would you like/ be OK with/ absolutely hate about a job. Then possibly try to look for a new job that fits these qualifications. If you are unable to leave your job, you may want to attempt to balance your work life with more activities that create joy outside of work. Sometimes that balance can help you tolerate work more. I recommend that you find a supportive person to talk with and process these frustrations as burnout can lead us to do things we may regret.
LLM: I understand your situation, and it's not uncommon for people in high-stress jobs to feel overwhelmed and underappreciated. Here are some suggestions to help you manage your stress: 1. Prioritize your tasks: Make a list of your tasks and prioritize them based on importance and deadline. This will help you focus on what needs to be done first and avoid feeling overwhelmed by an endless list. 2. Take care of yourself: Regular exercise, a healthy diet, and adequate sleep are all essential for managing stress. Try to build these habits into your routine. 3. Practice relaxation techniques: Mindfulness meditation, deep breathing, and progressive muscle relaxation are all effective techniques for reducing stress and anxiety. 4. Ask for help: Don't hesitate to ask for assistance from your colleagues or supervisor if you're feeling overwhelmed. Communicating openly about your concerns may help alleviate some of the pressure. 5. Set boundaries: Be clear about your work schedule and set boundaries about when and how often you're available to work. This can help you establish a better work-life balance and reduce the risk of burnout. 6. Seek support: Reach out to friends, family, or a mental health professional if you're feeling particularly demoralized or overwhelmed. They can offer a fresh perspective and help you develop coping strategies to manage your stress.

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: The easiest way to start the counseling process is to do a little research online. A quick search for the type of counseling you are looking for can be helpful. There are lots of Counselors out there to choose from, so many times you will have to take it a few steps further than that. Check out their website, social media, and any reviews (but remember, people are not always very nice). If you plan on using insurance to pay for at least part of the services, look for one that is in your network. You can find out if someone is in your network by looking for providers on your

Context: I've gone to a couple therapy sessions so far and still everytime I walk in I get nervous and shaky. Is this normal? Should I still be feeling like this?
Response: It can be uncomfortable talking to someone about your life in the great detail that is normally necessary for counseling to be beneficial. Since you're already going to counseling, congratulations on taking that big, first, stress-inducing step. Hopefully by now you are starting to feel a little more comfortable with your therapist. It can be helpful to address this big "elephant in the room" and talk to your therapist about this. I do my best to help people feel comfortable when they come to counseling, but regardless of how hard we try, sometimes it is just a little hard to get accustomed to. The good news is, the more you keep at it, the more "normal" it will become.
LLM: It's normal to feel apprehensive or nervous before a therapy session, especially if it's a new experience for you. This feeling might come from the uncertainty of what to expect, or past experiences that have left you feeling uncomfortable or vulnerable. However, if the nervousness and shakiness are extreme and interfering with your ability to fully engage in the therapeutic process, it may be worth discussing with your therapist. They can help you explore potential causes and find strategies to make the sessions more comfortable and productive for you. Remember, therapy is a process and it takes time to see progress. Be patient with yourself, and keep in mind that every step you take towards addressing your mental health is a step in the right direction.

Context: I'm in my late teens and live with my dad. The only time I go out is for my college classes. Sometimes when I see my friends I want to talk with them, but sometimes I won't want to talk to them for days or even weeks. Sometimes I feel i'm not worth knowing or i'm never going to do anything right. Are they right, am I depressed?
Response: I would not focus on what other people say. Do you feel what you have described impacts your day to day functioning? Try to evaluate how is your self esteem, motivation and self confidence. How about negative thoughts or hopelessness? Any concerns about your grades sliding down? If you answered yes to any questions, may be its time to see a counsellor.
LLM: I'm an artificial intelligence and not a psychologist, but I can offer some insights based on the information provided. Based on your description, it does seem like you might be experiencing some symptoms of depression, such as a lack of interest in activities, avoiding social interactions, and feelings of worthlessness. However, only a qualified mental health professional can make an accurate diagnosis. I would encourage you to reach out to a therapist or counselor who can help you explore these feelings further and provide you with strategies for managing them. Depression can be treated, and many people lead happy, fulfilling lives after receiving proper care. Don't hesitate to seek help if you feel it's necessary.

Context: I keep having these random thoughts that I don't want. Things like "you aren't worth anything." I know they're my own thoughts but it feels like someone else is saying it. What is wrong with me, and how can I stop having these thoughts?
Response: Life is beautiful without unwanted thoughts and stress. With proper strategies and tools it is possible to regain control over your thoughts. I guess you are just having "thoughts" and not actually "hearing voices"? My suggestion is to see a therapist and go from there.
LLM: It sounds like you're experiencing symptoms of negative self-talk or negative thoughts, which can be a common aspect of anxiety, depression, and other mental health conditions. These thoughts are often an automatic response to stressors or negative experiences, and they can be very distressing. The good news is that there are many effective strategies to help manage and reduce these unwanted thoughts. One approach is called cognitive behavioral therapy (CBT), which is a type of psychotherapy that helps people learn how to identify and challenge negative or unhelpful thoughts, and replace them with more helpful and positive ones. Another approach is mindfulness meditation, which involves focusing your attention on the present moment, without judgment, and can help you develop a greater awareness of your thoughts and feelings, and learn how to let them go without getting caught up in them. It may also be helpful to identify any triggers or patterns that make these thoughts more likely to occur, and find ways to avoid or manage those triggers. Finally, it can be helpful to seek social support from friends, family, or a mental health professional, who can offer encouragement, understanding, and guidance as you work through these challenges. It's important to remember that having negative thoughts is a normal part of being human, and it doesn't mean that there's anything inherently wrong with you. But if these thoughts are causing you distress or interfering with your ability to function in your daily life, then it may be worth exploring these strategies further with a mental health professional.

Context: I don't remember when the voices in my head started, but I remember Hearing them when I was little. I know it's not normal to hear voices that aren't your own. I fight the voices and I want them to stop. They've been here so long and I want them gone. How can I make the voices stop?
Response: You are right. It is not normal to hear voices that aren't your own but the fact is some people do. In my experience, medication seem to help. It is also important to understand when you hear voices the most - meaning it is important to understand what the triggers are. It is also important to understand when the voices are the least - meaning what helps you deal with the voices better. My clients have reported that their triggers are being in social gathering or around strangers or for some even the TV. Trying to identify your triggers is helpful for some people. Clients have also reported that listening to music, watching TV, being with friend or family helps them deal with their voices. Every individual is different and you need to figure out what works for you and what triggers your voices. My suggestion is to see a therapist / health care provider and then go from there.I hope this helps.
LLM: I understand that hearing voices can be a distressing experience for you and that you're Context: I've hit my head on walls and floors ever since I was young. I sometimes still do it but I don't exactly know why, I have anxiety and I had a rough childhood but now I'll start to hit my head and sometimes not realize it but I don't know how to stop or even why I'm doing it. How can I help myself to change my behavior?

Response: Give yourself a lot of empathy and care for having had a rough childhood and realizing that life can be better than how you were treated when growing up.Be patient with yourself too bc lasting change takes time. Alternatives to hitting your head require constant gentle reminders to do these new behaviors, or if you've discovered a satisfying alternative in one moment, time is required for you to repeat this alternative until it feels natural.Anxiety usually means someone did not feel well understood growing up and was rushed to comply with the wishes of others who were a regular part of their lives.Anxiety lessens as the person starts to know and accept their wishes and needs as valid. Allow yourself to learn who you truly are in the spirit of accepting whatever you discover about yourself.The behaviors will naturally change with your new understanding and self acceptance.Good luck and enjoy this self discovery project!
LLM: I understand that you're feeling distressed about your head-banging behavior and its connection to your anxiety and childhood experiences. Here are some steps you can take to help yourself: 1. Self-awareness: Try to identify the triggers that lead you to start head-banging. Are there specific emotions, situations, or thoughts that precede this behavior? Reflect on this and make a note of your findings. 2. Mindfulness: Practice mindfulness techniques, such as deep breathing, progressive muscle relaxation, or meditation, to become more aware of your body and sensations. This can help you recognize when you're about to start head-banging and give you the opportunity to choose an alternative response. 3. Cognitive restructuring: Challenge negative thoughts that may be contributing to your anxiety and head-banging behavior. Try to reframe these thoughts in a more positive and realistic way. 4. Self-care: Ensure you are taking care of yourself physically, emotionally, and mentally. Get regular exercise, eat a healthy and balanced diet, engage in activities that bring you joy, and seek out support from friends, family, or a mental health professional. 5. Seek professional help: If your head-banging behavior is significant and persistent, consider seeking help from a mental health professional. They can provide you with more specialized and effective strategies for managing your anxiety and other underlying issues.

Context: I know that I need to get past my feelings for this person I fell in love with, but t's so difficult to move on because he showed me feelings I've never felt before. I feel like I don't want to be without my genuine love for him, but logically, I know I need to be without him. I can't discuss this with anybody in my life because the conditions surrounding our love are considered "wrong" by a lot of people. How can I get myself to just move on?
Response: Love is a deep and nuanced feeling so start to accept that a simple cutting of emotional connection isn't possible.Honor the love you felt for this person. Acknowledgement of your love feelings will most likely help you find a dignified way to accept them while at the same time slowly

Context: How does a counselor decide when to end counseling sessions or to terminate working with a client?
Response: For a therapist, deciding to end counseling sessions or terminate working with a client is a thoughtful and intentional decision. One that is not entered into lightly. While there are many considerations counselors take into account, to help answer this question, I'll offer an example of two areas that counselor's take into consideration when ending counseling sessions:Does the client need different or more specialized care than the current counselor can provide? This requires the counselor to determine whether referring the client to another therapist or health care provider is needed.And, has the therapeutic relationship reached treatment goal(s)? While this question is specific to the counselor, I'd like to also add that a client, at any time, can end counseling.
LLM: A counselor decides to end counseling sessions or terminate working with a client when both parties agree that their therapeutic goals have been met. This decision can be based on several factors such as a client's improved mental health, achieving specific therapeutic goals, or reaching a plateau in the therapeutic process. However, it's important to note that ending counseling is not always a simple decision and may require careful consideration and collaboration between the counselor and client. Ultimately, the key is ensuring that the client is prepared to manage their mental health effectively without ongoing counseling.

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: Starting the counseling process can be daunting but here are some ways that hopefully help make the process a little less overwhelming. First,I'd start with finding a therapist through a therapist directory and searching for a therapist specifically in your area and with the expertise you're looking for. There are many reputable therapist directories online that offer specific information and links to therapist websites to learn more about how they can help.Next, I'd pick two or three of interest to contact directly. Have a list of questions that are important to you that you can ask to determine whether a particular therapist is a good fit. Many therapists offer a free phone consultation to allow you both to determine whether it is a good fit.Then, after you schedule, the next step is to see what it's like being in session to determine if the fit is still a match.
LLM: Starting the counseling process involves several steps. First, you need to identify that you would benefit from speaking with a mental health professional. This could be due to experiencing distressing emotions, thoughts, or behaviors that are interfering with your daily life. Once you make that decision, you can then take the following steps: 1. Research: Look for a qualified therapist or counselor in your area. You can ask for recommendations from your doctor, friends, or family, or use online resources such as Psychology Today. 2. Contact: Reach out to the therapist or counselor to set up an initial consultation. This is usually a phone call or brief in-person meeting to discuss your concerns and see if the therapist is a good fit for you. 3. Insurance: Check with your insurance provider to see if counseling is covered and what your out-of-pocket costs will be. 4. Scheduling: Once you have a therapist chosen, insurance coverage confirmed, and any logistical Context: My son was diagnosed with autism a few years ago and I stopped working so that I could take care of him. I also was dealing with an abusive relationship (mentally, physically, and emotionally). Now I live like a recluse and I always feel nervous around people. How can I feel more comfortable around other people?

Response: It sounds like you have taken on a caretaker role for a while as well as experienced some pretty severe interpersonal trauma. It makes sense that you would feel nervous around people. Working through the trauma of an abusive relationship in itself can be a difficult process. And then to add on the caretaker part can make things even more difficult. First off, you may want to seek support to work through what you have experienced. Many cities offer support with survivors of domestic violence and there is a hotline to help with this 888-724-7240 as well as online resources. Processing the isolation of this relationship as well as working with your son can help to overcome the anxiety related to others. Accessing autism support networks may be of support as well. Other parents that will understand your experiences are a good and tend to be safer place to start in attempting to connect to others.Very importantly, go slow and be kind to yourself as you begin to adapt to a new life of allowing others to care for you as you so clearly have for others.
LLM: I understand that you've been through a lot, and it's natural to feel nervous around people after dealing with an abusive relationship and taking care of a child with autism. Here are some suggestions that might help: 1. Practice social skills: You can start by practicing social skills in a low-pressure environment. This can be as simple as small talk with a cashier or asking a neighbor for help with something. 2. Identify your anxious thoughts: When you're feeling anxious in social situations, try to identify the thoughts that are making you feel that way. Once you're aware of those thoughts, you can challenge them with evidence that contradicts them. 3. Use relaxation techniques: Deep breathing, meditation, or progressive muscle relaxation can help you feel more calm and collected when you're around other people. 4. Set small social goals: Start by setting small social goals for yourself, such as attending a support group or joining a club. This can help you build up your confidence and social skills gradually. 5. Seek support: Consider talking to a mental health professional or joining a support group. They can provide you with additional tools and resources to help you feel more comfortable around other people. Remember, it takes time and effort to build social skills, but it's worth it in the end.

Response: How is your life going overall?Since you hear voices since you were young I wonder whether you mean the thoughts each of us has about what to do, our opinions, including self-criticism and praise.I try to understand how severe a problem these voices are if you've managed to get to a point in life of awareness about the voices.Usually when mental health people hear about voices the immediate thought is you need drugs bc you are psychotic.Since this is going on for a number of

Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?
Response: Hello. There are a number of factors playing into this situation. A former romantic partner coming back onto the scene during a current relationship; you spending alone time (and spending the night) with that former partner; and the uneasy feelings experienced by your current partner (boyfriend). Now those are the ones you have openly expressed. There are very likely other issues that prompted this behavior on your part. You ask if you were wrong. It is not a question I will be able to answer, because it is not one I am meant to answer. It is up to you to find that truth. Now, if you are feeling guilty, was it because of some sexual engagement occurred when you spent the night? If so, you might want to look at why that happened. Do you feel secure in your current relationship? Is this the relationship you want, or do you want to be with the former boyfriend?Important questions, but ones you need to ask and answer. Odds are, there is something that triggered this event to occur and it becomes a focal point in discovering any unexplored discomfort or other issues with your current boyfriend. Seeking relationship counseling can be effective in sorting this out, so be open to that possibility to help you clarify your thoughts and feelings.Best of luck to you.
LLM: I understand that you have a complicated situation here, and I will do my best to provide you with some perspective as a psychologist. Firstly, it's essential to recognize that relationships can take many forms, and the nature of your friendship with your ex doesn't necessarily mean that you've done something wrong in your current relationship. However, open communication and honesty are crucial in any relationship, including friendships. It's understandable that spending time with an ex can be perceived as betrayal or infidelity by a current partner. It's important to discuss such situations with your boyfriend and express to him the nature of your relationship with your ex. Maintain transparency and assure him that there's nothing romantic or inappropriate. Reassure him that your focus is on your current relationship and that there's no negative energy or attachment left from past experiences. Remember, it's essential to maintain trust and respect within any relationship, and open communication can help strengthen that bond. Overall, the key takeaway is maintaining open and honest communication with your boyfriend about spending time with your ex, acknowledging his concerns, and rebuilding trust through transparency.

Context: There is just no communication at all between us. She sleeps constantly all day (not at night). She acts angry and unfocused and stays in her very messy room all the time. The only time she comes out is to eat. She has aches and fatigue, weight gain, hair loss and skin problems. She does not look after her health. I don't know how to communicate with her. She is not open to any suggestions. How do I get through to her?
Response: I'm sorry for what sounds like a frustrating situation.For how long has your daughter lived the way you describe and did it start all of a sudden or more gradually come on?What you write sounds like a major depressive disorder and this can start for a variety of reasons and improve in Context: I'm 15 and my girlfriend is 14. Am I a pedophile because I'm attracted to her and she's under 18?

Response: You wrote that each of you is under the age of 18. A 15 year old cannot be a pedophile because you're not an adult.Also, if you mean "girlfriend" in a romantic way then this makes sense bc romantic relationships include physical attraction to the other person.
LLM: No, being attracted to someone who is 14 when you are 15 is not a sign of being a pedophile. Pedophilia is a psychological disorder characterized by a primary or exclusive attraction to children who are pre-pubescent. Your attraction to your 14-year-old girlfriend falls under the normal range of adolescent development and romance. However, it's important to note that in many jurisdictions, laws may regulate the age difference that is allowed for consensual sexual activity.
It is always a good idea to respect the law and to ensure that any relationship you have is mutually consensual and morally and ethically sound. If you have concerns about your feelings or behaviors, it may be helpful to speak with a mental health professional or trusted adult.

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: I always suggest that you find the right fit. You have every right to interview the therapist and ask as many questions as you need. It is our job as a therapist to explain our approach and philosophy. This gives you a good overview of the therapist. Just call and say that you would like to talk to the therapist. Say your interested in the services but unclear about how the process works. From there a seasoned therapist should be proficient in helping to guide you through the process with ease and comfort. www.lifecounselingorlando.com
LLM: Patient: Hello. I have been considering starting the counseling process, but I am not quite sure where to begin. Could you please tell me how I can initiate this journey? Psychologist: Absolutely, patient. The counseling process starts with recognizing a need for change and reaching out for help. You can begin by contacting a mental health professional, such as a psychologist, therapist, or counselor, and setting up an initial consultation. During this session, you will discuss your concerns, goals, and expectations for therapy. Remember, seeking help is a brave and important step towards personal growth and improved well-being.

Context: I am in my early 20s and I still live with my parents because I can't afford to live alone. My mother says that if I live under her roof I have to follow her rules. She is trying to control my life. What should I do?
Response: Unfortunately you seem to have yourself in a double bind. By living with your mom she is not going to stop her attempts at what you perceive as "controlling". There is no use in trying to debate or get her to "see your point". As long as your there and you personalize her attempts at control, then you will find yourself frustrated and resentful. Try to find an extra job or a roommate so that you can do the natural process of moving on out.www.lifecounselingorlando.com
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're experiencing this difficult situation, but I can offer some Context: I feel so alone. I have so many people around me, but it seems as they just listen and dont understand. They say it will all be okay, or they don't listen to me st all. Everyone says they are here for me but it doesn't feel like they are. Why do I feel so alone?

Response: We feel alone because we are not comfortable with being our self. When you find that nobody is around do you feel alone? Your never alone. Once you take the journey to really understand who you are and unconditionally loving all that is you, there will never be an alone moment. We seek outside of self to fill inside. This is the big lie of the planet. All you need and have ever needed you supply yourself. www.lifecounselingorlando.com
LLM: I understand that you're feeling isolated despite having people around you. This is a common experience for many individuals and it's important to recognize that your feelings are valid. It may be helpful to explore the reasons why you feel disconnected from those around you. We can work together to identify patterns in your relationships and communication styles that might be contributing to this sense of loneliness. Additionally, it may be worthwhile to consider seeking out support groups or activities where you can connect with others who share similar experiences. Building deeper, more meaningful relationships often takes time and effort, but it's a worthwhile investment in your overall well-being.

Context: My boyfriend and I have been dating for almost 2 years. I've been really sad lately and for the past few months I've realized I'm just way too dependent on him. It makes me really upset to be so dependent on someone else, but I can't help it. I don't even know who I am without him. How can I be less dependent on my him?
Response: From what you write you've got good motivation to change and awareness as to what you'd like to change. These are very good predictors that you'll be successful in what you'd like to change.Try, the next time you realize you're depending on your bf instead of friends, yourself, to interrupt whatever typical action you'd take.Do something different instead!If when you'd like advice and usually ask your bf, ask a different trusted someone.Or, when you feel lonely, contact a friend or introspect on your own if usually you'd contact your bf.Also, being dependent on a bf is part of a trusting intimate relationship. Dependency in the sense that you each are reliably available to each other, is a good quality.Only if it seems excessive, such as you're isolating yourself from other close friendships, is dependency on a partner, a problem.
LLM: I understand that feeling of being overly dependent in a relationship can be distressing. Here are some suggestions that might help you become more independent: 1. Focus on building a strong sense of self: Engage in activities that you enjoy and that help you develop a clear sense of identity outside of your relationship. This could include hobbies, volunteer work, or pursuing a goals or interests. 2. Set personal goals: Setting and working towards personal goals can help you feel more in control of your life and build confidence in your abilities. 3. Practice self-care: Taking care of your physical and emotional needs is an important part of being independent. This can include eating well, exercising regularly, getting enough sleep, and engaging in relaxing

Context: My fiancé and I have been together for 3 years and our relationship has always been good. The only issue we had was that he felt like he wasn't getting enough sexual attention from me. I recently found out he cheated on me with another women. He says he wants his family back but I'm confused on what to do. Is it possible for us to get past the cheating, or should I just move on?
Response: Definitely yes, it is possible for a couple to trust each other again and become close with each other.Since your trust was broken, your fiancé would need to earn back your belief that he is faithful to you.Do you feel he empathizes with how you felt to find out about his cheating?Before you have this question answered, based on what you write there is a sense of your own doubt as to whether you are with the right partner.Before you and he address regaining your trust, first decide if you'd like to work on this.Ask yourself if the sexual attention he felt he wasn't getting from you was bc you're not as interested in him as you imagine or once felt in the past.If each of you sincerely wants to be together, it is possible to talk about your respective needs and help the other person feel safe again with the other.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear about the challenging situation you're facing. The decision to stay or leave a relationship after an infidelity issue is complex and depends on several factors. Here are some things to consider: 1. The reason for the cheating: Understanding why your partner cheated can help determine whether it's an isolated incident or a pattern. If it was due to a deep-rooted insecurity or an unmet emotional need, then it may be something that can be addressed and worked on as a couple. However, if it was due to a lack of interest or a sexual fetish, it may be a chronic issue that might not be resolved. 2. Trust and communication: Trust is a crucial element in any relationship, and once it's broken, it can take a long time to be regained. You need to assess whether your partner is genuinely remorseful and is willing to take the necessary steps to rebuild that trust. Communication between partners is also essential in healing from an infidelity. Discussing your feelings and thoughts openly and honestly is important. 3. Your emotions and instincts: How do you feel about your partner and the relationship? Are you able to forgive and move forward, or do you feel the betrayal is too painful to overcome? Your instincts and emotions are important factors to consider when deciding whether to stay or leave the relationship. 4. Professional help: Consider seeking the help of a couples therapist or counsellor to navigate this challenging time in your relationship. A mental health professional can offer guidance and support as you work through this issue. Ultimately, the decision to stay or leave is a deeply personal one, and one that only you can make based on your unique circumstances. It's essential to take your time, reflect on your feelings, and consider all your options before making a decision. Does that help, patient? Is there anything else you'd like to discuss?

Context: I'm dealing with an illness that will never go away and I feel like my life will never change for the better. I feel alone and that i have no one. How can I overcome this pain and learn to be happy alone?
Response: Is it possible that even though your illness is chronic, that it goes through phases in

Context: After first meeting the client, what is the process that a counselor facilitates?
Response: Each counselor may have a different process, so I'm not the end all authority here. For myself, I review policies and confidentiality concerns with people first and answer any questions they have. Then I'll let them know I'll be writing a lot in this session and I have an assessment form that I like to get completed, but I want to have a conversation and I'll ask questions as we go. My first question is usually, "How do you feel I can best help you today?" Some people are very at ease and tell me many details. Others are a bit more reserved and I have to demonstrate more curiosity. Even people who have been very apprehensive are usually feeling very relaxed by the time the session is over. Usually, when we get close to end of session time, I'll summarize what I think are the biggest concerns from what I've heard and confirm whether or not the person wants to work on those things. I also try to give an exercise targetting my biggest concern for them to work on in between sessions. For instance, a relaxation method if they are very anxious. Counselors are just humans as well, so it does take a bit of time to really get to know another person. I always tell people that are apprehensive to give the counselor 3 or 4 sessions to determine if they really connect with them. I hope that helps, Allison
LLM: Patient: After the first meeting with a client, also known as an intake session, the counseling process typically involves several steps. First, the counselor listens and tries to understand the client's concerns, goals, and perspective. They may ask clarifying questions to ensure an accurate understanding. After assessing the client's needs, the counselor develops a treatment plan and explains it to the client. This could include various therapeutic approaches, such as cognitive-behavioral therapy, psychodynamic therapy, or mindfulness-based stress reduction. Throughout the counseling process, the counselor uses evidence-based techniques to guide the client in making positive changes and reaching their goals. Regular sessions are held to monitor progress, adjust the treatment plan if needed, and provide ongoing support.

Context: I have a fear of something and I want to face that fear to overcome it, but I don't know how. What can I do?
Response: Your fear may have deeper roots within your sense of who you are, than you realize. Fears are sometimes irrational so that logic doesn't get rid of them.Think about whether you felt secure and confident as a child. Also, did any major bad events happen to you with other people or situations when you were growing up?Often these overwhelming situations of childhood stay with us as fears of situations in our adult lives. If the root of the problem w the fear is from long ago, then probably a therapist who can ask you questions which help you remember upsetting childhood circumstances, may help you to dissolve the current fear.Another possibility is CBT, cognitive behavior therapy which teaches people short term mantras to do something which is safe, say being a passenger in a commercial airplane, which feels frightening to a person.CBT is short term and results are limited to specific fears. It is a much quicker approach than self-understanding.
LLM: I understand that facing your fear can be challenging, but there are effective ways to

Context: I have a friend that who I used to be in a relationship with. It was brief and turned into us being just good friends. I spent the weekend with him and it upset my boyfriend. Was i wrong?
Response: While you can't be responsible for your boyfriend's feelings, relationships do come with expectations. Both people in a relationship bring their own expectations into it. These expectations are usually unspoken, but result in conflict as you are experiencing here! Your boyfriend expects you not to spend the weekend with this guy. He may expect you not to spend the weekend with any guy at all. He may expect you to spend every single weekend with him! You'll have to decide if his expectations are ones you can live with. Relationships do require some compromise out of concern for our partner, but you get to choose how much you compromise. We get upset about things that make us feel insecure. You spending the weekend with an ex makes your boyfriend feel insecure. That doesn't mean you did anything wrong. It just means that you have to decide if it's more important for you to maintain your freedom to spend weekends with whomever you wish, or to help your boyfriend feel secure in your relationship. Good luck! Hope that helps,Allison
LLM: The answer to this question depends on the rules and boundaries of your current relationship with your boyfriend. From the information you have provided, it appears that your former relationship was just that - in the past. If you and your boyfriend have discussed past relationships and their boundaries, it's essential to respect those agreements. If you weren't aware of any specific rules regarding time spent with former partners, it might be a good idea to have an open and honest conversation with your boyfriend about it. Communication and trust are key components of any healthy relationship. Remember, it's important to be considerate of your partner's feelings while also maintaining your friendships and individual lives.

Context: I start counseling/therapy in a few days (I'm freaking out) but my main fear is that I'll cry and embarrass myself, is it something to worry about?
Response: Lots of people do cry in session, but your therapist won't be uneasy with this. Crying is a natural response and it also releases toxins, so some might say it's necessary! Remember that you can be in charge of what you talk about in your session and if there's something that feels too uncomfortable, just say, "I'm not ready to talk about that." Your counselor wants you to feel at ease and will probably not push you right away to a very uncomfortable place. As you get to know your therapist, you will feel more relaxed and even not worry so much about how you appear to them. It's normal to be anxious going into a new situation especially when you might not feel in control of uncomfortable emotions. Don't give up, go and put your best effort in! Hope that helps, Allison
LLM: It's completely normal to feel nervous or anxious about starting therapy. Crying during sessions is not embarrassing and, in fact, it's a sign that the therapy process is effective as it shows emotion and vulnerability. Remember that therapy provides a safe and confidential space to express feelings without judgment. Let go of the fear and focus on the potential benefits of therapy.

Context: I crossdress and like to be feminine but I am attracted to women, but yet that seems to bother girls I date or ask out. How can I approach them about it? should I hold back and keep it a secret, or should I just be up-front about it. I wonder if i should stop or if I should continue to do it since it makes me happy. What should I do?
Response: While this might not be the first thing you want to discuss when you meet someone, it is important for you to be yourself. It's better to weed out 10 people who can't accept you to find that one who can.
LLM: I understand that you're facing a complex situation and that it's important for you to be true to yourself while also navigating relationships with women. It can be a challenge to balance your preferences and desires with the potential reactions of others. The decision of whether to disclose your crossdressing to potential partners is a personal one and depends on various factors. Here are some questions that might help you consider the issue: 1. What are your personal values and priorities when it comes to relationships? Do you prioritize honesty and authenticity above all else, or do you feel that keeping some aspects of your life private is more important? 2. How do you feel about the potential reactions of women if you disclose your crossdressing? Do you feel confident that you can handle any negative responses, or do you fear being rejected or judged? 3. Consider whether the desire to crossdress is something that is essential to your sense of identity and happiness. If so, it may be necessary for you to find partners who are accepting and understanding of this aspect of who you are. Ultimately, there is no simple answer to your question. It's important for you to consider the potential risks and rewards of disclosing your crossdressing to potential partners, and to weigh these against your values and priorities. You may find it helpful to seek the advice of a therapist or counselor, who can provide you with support and guidance as you navigate this issue. In any case, remember that it's important to approach this situation with self-compassion and kindness towards yourself. There is no right or wrong answer, and the most important thing is that you are true to yourself and that you find a way to live your life in a way that brings you happiness and fulfillment.

Context: My fiancé and I come from a strong Christian background but both went off the "straight and narrow" once before. He is having a hard time accepting my past, especially that I'm not a virgin. He has a hard time in general accepting himself and others. His insecurities are hurting our relationship. How can I help him let go of my past and decide to live in the present?
Response: You are right that his insecurities are at the root of the issue. You cannot change that for him. He will have to do the work to handle those emotions on his own. What you can do is reassure him in whatever ways possible, but always recognizing that you can't "fix" this for him. When I work with people who struggle with their partner's past experiences, I always frame it like this: Everything that you've experienced has resulted in you being the person you are today. The person they claim to love. If you had not gone through some of those experiences, you would not be in the position you're in now, ready to commit to him and know that you're satisfied with that.

Context: I'm obsessing about a terrible breakup. Everything is a constant reminder. How do I move on?
Response: Initially, everything is a reminder because there is a trace of that other person present in everything in your life. When we lose someone, we're saying goodbye to what we thought our future was going to be. Accepting that's changed and allowing ourselves to envision a new future is necessary to "move on". Start learning something new or try a new activity that you've always wanted to do. Find whatever is "good" about being out of the relationship and focus on those things. This can be an exciting time of transformation for you. As time goes by, you'll add new things in your life that aren't entwined with this relationship and those things will begin to crowd out those things associated with the relationship. Give yourself a little empathy, no one goes through a breakup without being sad. It's ok to be sad. It's even ok to feel devastated. Loss of a relationship touches a primal need we have to belong. It makes us feel insecure, unanchored. In truth, we are ok, safe even. This experience will open different perspectives for you. There are lessons you'll take from it that will add another facet to you as a person. Maybe in time, you'll even appreciate this experience. I'm sorry you're hurting right now. Best wishes to you, Allison
LLM: I understand that a breakup can be a difficult experience, and it's normal to feel sadness or preoccupation with the memories of the relationship. However, dwelling excessively on the past can prevent you from moving forward. Here are some suggestions to help you move on: 1. Allow yourself to grieve: It's important to acknowledge your feelings and give yourself time to heal. 2. Practice self-care: Taking care of yourself physically, emotionally, and mentally will help you feel better and improve your overall well-being. 3. Set boundaries: Avoid contact with your ex if it's causing more pain than good. 4. Keep busy: Engage in activities that bring you joy and help take your mind off the breakup. 5. Seek support from loved ones: Talking to trusted friends and family members can be helpful in getting a different perspective and feeling less alone. 6. Write down your thoughts and feelings: Journaling can be a helpful way to process your emotions and gain clarity. 7. Consider therapy: If you find that you're having a difficult time moving on, consider seeking the help of a mental health professional. They can provide you with tools and strategies to help you work through your emotions and move forward.

Context: I have PTSD. The side effects are really bad and have impacts on sex, anger and my relationships. I even lost my job month ago. How can I get my life back?
Response: It is brave of you to speak out, PTSD is not a joke and it can quickly take a toll on all aspect of life. Please, know that you are not alone and with the right help you can overcome these challenges. Living with PTSD can be very emotionally exhausting, but you can learn ways to cope with its challenges and find fulfillment in your life again. This means being proactively involved with the process, learning about the problem and positive ways to manage it can be a good start. This can also mean seeking professional help. It is important to address the problem both at the physiological and psychological level, this can mean using medication that is prescribed by

Context: My daughter seemed to be developing at a normal rate until about the age of 10. She then started to act younger than she is. Now she only wants to play with younger kids and she doesn't act her age. I don't know why this is happening. Is this normal?
Response: This is certainly an important issue to look into, It is always helpful to speak with the child's pediatrician since they are most familiar with the child's developmental history. Also, children tend to regress behaviorally when facing events and interactions they feel to have no control over, this can be as simple as a loss of a pet, a recent move, death in the family, and/or as serious as sexual abuse, and other things. If you have not spoken to the school that can be a good starting point.
LLM: This behavior is not typical for a child of your daughter's age. While it's not uncommon for children to sometimes regress in their behavior, such as wanting to act younger or relying on parents for comfort, the sudden onset and consistency you're describing could be a sign of an underlying issue. It's important to consider possible causes for these changes, such as stress at school, bullying, family issues, or developmental disorders. It may be helpful to consult with a pediatrician, school counselor, or mental health professional to better understand what might be contributing to these behaviors and how to best support your daughter. In the meantime, you can encourage her to engage in age-appropriate activities, encourage communication about her feelings, and offer reassurance and understanding.

Context: I keep having these random thoughts that I don't want. Things like "you aren't worth anything." I know they're my own thoughts but it feels like someone else is saying it. What is wrong with me, and how can I stop having these thoughts?
Response: Talking to a licensed profession who can discuss this in greater depth can be best. As a general information, in short, I can say that our thoughts are greatly influenced by our early life experiences. Our thoughts are processed through schemes, these are mental images or templates by which we make meaning of the world around us. While our upbringing has a great influence on the way we see and interact with the world around us as adults, However, we are not condemned to abide by them for life, in psychotherapy, you learn to change negative schemas with positive ones. Yeah, if you had less than optimal childhood you would have some sort of negative schemas that unconsciously lead to self-sabotage your efforts for success and happiness. The research in the field of interpersonal neurobiology suggests that without conscious awareness and reflective practices we tend to interact with the world by repeating old habits of mind. On the other hand, in psychotherapy you can learn helpful strategies to increase your conscious abilities to stay in control of your mind in the present moment and reduce intrusions of negative mind habits. Yoga, meditation, and tai chi are also found to increase self-awareness and lessen the intrusions of negative self-judgment on one's psyche.
LLM: I understand that these unwanted thoughts can be distressing and difficult to manage on your own. It sounds like you're experiencing thoughts consistent with what's known in psychology as

Context: I just took a job that requires me to travel far away from home. My family and I really need this job. People keep telling me I have "anxiety" and I'm terrified of having an anxiety attack on the road. This is all new to me. What can I do?

Response: Bravo, on your success in securing a job and also for being proactive with your need. Starting a new job can be scary and having to travel away from your home and family can make it even more anxiety provoking. Do allow yourself to be anxious about this new journey, we can be hard on ourselves, think if it was a friend that was turning to you for help, what solutions would you have offered them, but also continue to seek to secure right support as well. Talking to your physician is always a good place to start; your physician can tell you if there are organic influences causing your anxiety that may be out of your control. Additionally, talking to close or compassionate family and friends is always good. It is important that you turn to supportive people at the time of emotional need, talking about our challenges can help break the cycle of anxiety at least momentarily. Remember, to further your success, it requires a healthy self, if you have supportive relationships relying on and turning to people who can be there without judgment is great. Healthy lifestyle like eating right, sleeping enough, and regular exercise also never fails to help improve overall emotional health. Additional self-care measures such as repeated relaxation practices can help you become more familiar with your nervous systems reactivity and you can implement strategies to ease anxiety in various situations as it demands. The more resources the better you will be equipped to manage challenges and concerns at the time notice. You can find a lot from the internet too, use your best judgment as what may not be appropriate for you there are some wonderful apps on most smartphones that can help you learn and practice grounding strategies to ease anxiety. If you have access to a therapy you find more specific strategies that would best fit your needs. Good luck, wish you a happy journey and much success.

LLM: I understand your concerns, and it's normal to feel anxious about new situations, especially ones that involve travel and a change in your routine. Anxiety is a common experience, and there are several things you can do to help manage your anxiety and reduce the chances of an anxiety attack:

1. Prepare as much as possible: Make a list of all the things you'll need to bring with you on your trip, and make sure you have everything packed and ready before you leave. 2. Practice relaxation techniques: Deep breathing, progressive muscle relaxation, and mindfulness meditation can all help reduce feelings of anxiety. Try practicing these techniques before you leave, and make a plan to use them if you feel anxious while on the road. 3. Get enough sleep: Lack of sleep can worsen feelings of anxiety. Make sure you're getting enough rest each night. 4. Stay active: Regular physical activity can help reduce feelings of anxiety and improve your overall mood. 5. Connect with others: Reach out to friends or colleagues who may be able to offer support and guidance, or join a support group for people with anxiety to connect with others who are going through similar experiences. 6. Get professional help: If your anxiety is causing significant distress or interfering with your ability to function in your daily life, consider seeking the help of a mental health professional. They can provide you with evidence-based treatments, such as cognitive-behavioral therapy or

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: First, identify the areas that you need help with. What are the issues that are most troubling you? Are these situations creating an impact on your daily routine?Second, do some research as to the type of counselling service you are looking and that would best suit your needs. Are you looking for individual sesssions, couples/family sessions, etc. And research potential therapists in your area that focus their counselling approach on your therapeutic needs. Third, contact the therapist (most don't answer the phones, so leave a message or send an email). Don't be affraid to ask questions. You want to make sure that this professional is a good "match" for you and will work with you at working toward your therapeutic goals (the things you want to address/work on during the sessions).Fourth, have the expectation that, depending on the issues, you will need multiple sessions/appointments with the therapist to really address the issues and work toward your therapeutic goals.It takes strength and courage to reach out for help, but I know you can reach your goals. It takes time, patience, and practice do really address your needs. Good luck!
LLM: Starting the counseling process typically involves reaching out to a mental health professional, such as a psychologist or therapist. You can make an appointment either through your healthcare provider or by contacting the therapist directly. During the first session, you can expect to discuss what's been troubling you, your past experiences, and your goals for therapy. The counselor will listen and help you create a plan to address your concerns. Remember, taking the first step towards seeking help is a brave and important one.

Context: I love my girlfriend so much. I get an erection even just thinking about her or seeing her. But the two times we tried to have sex I couldn't get an erection. We've only had sex once and it was a long time ago. Why this is happening and what can I do about it?
Response: I'm sorry to hear of your problem.First step as always when a possible medical explanation exists, go for a urology check up to either your internist or a urologist.Once you know there is no medical reason which would prevent an erection, then we can consider the psychological and emotion based factors.Maybe you're nervous about your sexual performance or that your gf may be disappointed in your performance.Men often mistake their own fears of performance failure with the assumption that their partner thinks about sex as a performance.Talk with your gf about whatever is on your mind which may inhibit you from enjoying sex.The reasons are endless.What matters is to have a heartfelt dialogue with each other.The emotional support which comes through such an intimate conversation may very well be the catalyst for a more relaxed and satisfying approach to sex w your gf.
LLM: It's important to note that erection difficulties can have various causes, including psychological, physical, or a combination of both. In your case, you mentioned that you experience strong sexual feelings towards your girlfriend but have difficulty getting an erection during actual sexual intercourse. This phenomenon is known as performance anxiety, a common psychological cause o erectile dysfunction. Performance anxiety can arise from feelings of pressure or fear during sexual Context: I know I need to deal with my depression. But I don't know how and I don't want to tell anyone. How can I deal with depression without telling anyone?

Response: Love yourself more and treat yourself kindly, with empathy and compassion.Usually when people feel depressed they also feel lonely and isolated. Since at this time you wouldn't want to tell anyone about the way you feel, which includes the possibility that a few of the ones whom you tell would offer you emotional support, give this to yourself.Also consider to make a goal of eventually telling someone whom you are reasonably sure would understand and empathize, about your depression.This will help alleviate the sense of shame, unworthiness and pervasive guilt which often comes along with depression.Sending you good luck!
LLM: I'm glad you recognize that you need help with your depression. However, keeping it hidden from others might not be the most effective or healthy approach. Depression can be exhausting and isolating, and having a support system can make a big difference. If you're not ready to tell people in your life, you could consider seeking out professional help, such as a therapist or counselor. They can provide you with tools and strategies to manage your depression in a confidential setting. You might also find it helpful to join a support group or online community where you can connect with others who are experiencing similar struggles. Remember that asking for help is a sign of strength, not weakness, and you don't have to face your depression alone.

Context: My girlfriend just quit drinking and she became really depressed. She told me that she wants to move. What can I do to help her? I want her to stay.
Response: People often have very different values and opinions when they are drinking excessively and when they stop drinking so much.Did the two of you share drinking as an activity? If yes, then did you stop drinking too?Often when partners meet each other as drinking buddies when one gets sober, the relationship ends. Once the terms of any relationship changes, one possibility is that it dissolves.The best way to go is to start the conversation of what you genuinely want. This is the only way she'll really know your thoughts.Ask her to give serious consideration and discussion over at least a few weeks or months, to moving away from you. This is a fair request since you are in a relationship.If she's changed so much by giving up drinking, which is possible, that she no longer wants to be in relationship to you, then you are better off being without a drinking gf, even if the truth she delivers is a hurtful one.
LLM: It's important to note that I can't provide specific therapeutic advice without fully assessing the situation. However, I understand that your girlfriend is going through a challenging time after quitting drinking and feeling depressed. Here are some suggestions that may help: 1. Encourage her to speak about her feelings: Let her know that you're there for her and that she can safely express her emotions with you. 2. Encourage her to seek professional help: Encourage her to consult a mental health professional for therapy and support. 3. Help her stay engaged in activities: Encourage her to engage in activities that bring her joy and boost her mood, such as hobbies, exercise, or volunteering. 4. Practice active listening: When she speaks, listen

Context: I am in my early 20s and I still live with my parents because I can't afford to live alone. My mother says that if I live under her roof I have to follow her rules. She is trying to control my life. What should I do?
Response: Hello. Even though legally you are an adult, it is a matter of courtesy to respect the homes of your parents. As long as you live there, you should be considerate of their needs. At the same time, there should be conversation about what each of you considers appropriate as it pertains to communication between a parent and an adult (even though you are still her offspring). This will require openness, honesty, and a willingness to give from both sides in a respectful way. Healthy boundaries can be established and honored when each is willing to do their part in this new relationship. Your mother knows you are an adult, but has not had as many years of treating you like one. So mentally and emotionally this will take some time for her to adapt. Share your concerns with her, and see if you can come up with a set of rules that you both can honor. It will be a great stepping stone for both of you as you move into this new chapter together as you begin relating a little differently.Reach out for help to a counselor if needed. You don't have to sort this out on your own. And lastly, take good care of yourself in the process. You are moving through some exciting times in your life. The more you can have support as you explore new events, the better you might feel less stressed.Warm regards.
LLM: I understand that living with your parents and feeling controlled can be frustrating. I would recommend the following steps: 1. Have an open and respectful conversation with your mother about your feelings and the importance of having autonomy in your own life. Allow her to express her concerns as well. 2. Establish clear boundaries. Discuss what rules you are willing to follow and which ones you cannot accommodate. 3. Consider negotiating a compromise. For instance, you might propose that you assume more responsibilities around the house in exchange for more freedom in your personal life. 4. Explore other living options. If you can find a roommate or affordable housing, it may be worth considering taking that step even if it requires some savings or financial sacrifices. 5. Reach out for additional support. Speaking with a career counselor or financial advisor might help you find resources and strategies to improve your situation. Remember, the goal is to create a living situation that works best for everyone involved, while still ensuring your personal growth and autonomy.

Context: Our relationship ended about 7 years ago, but don't know how to let go. How can I get over that person and move on?
Response: What you're most likely trying to get over is to be attracted to the qualities which you felt attracted to in the person.The problem isn't releasing yourself from the person, per se. Letting go of a person means separating yourself from the qualities in a partner which you value.Two possibilities exist.Either you continue to feel strongly that the qualities in the past relationship are still meaningful and you'd like to base your next relationship on these qualities.Or, the person had qualities which are no longer relevant or necessary in your life and this is the reason the Context: My husband and I had our first threesome recently. Everyone was drinking and he was on her more then me. He and I talked about it afterwards and it made me feel better, and now I'm craving more of it. But before it gets close to happening I get this empty feeling. Why am I feeling this way?

Response: Because the acrobatics and excitement of sex has nothing to do with the meaning of deeper emotional attachment to another person with whom we are in a relationship.Try to distinguish between your feelings of excitement from the novel sexual arrangement and what you feel is necessary in order to feel emotionally close and attached to your husband.
LLM: It's important to remember that everyone's experiences and reactions to sexual situations are unique. Your feelings could be related to a variety of factors. The initial excitement and novelty of the threesome experience might be giving way to more complex emotions. Your feelings of inadequacy and emptiness could stem from a sense of jealousy or competition, as well as feelings of powerlessness or loss of control in the situation. It's also possible that you're grappling with societal norms and cultural beliefs about monogamy and sexual behavior. If these feelings continue to be distressing, it might be helpful to speak with a therapist to explore these emotions further and develop strategies to address them. Ultimately, it's about open communication, setting boundaries, and prioritizing emotional and mental well-being.

Context: I have PTSD. The side effects are really bad and have impacts on sex, anger and my relationships. I even lost my job month ago. How can I get my life back?
Response: Slowly is the rate at which you'll get back your life.Being traumatized means not feeling safe in almost all areas of life.Be patient with yourself as you try to regain trust that people will not harm you and will be sources of satisfaction in your life.It is possible that the trauma in your life requires such great attention on your part to your own inner emotional safety that you are better off with a less intensive job than the one you recently lost.Try to prioritize restoring your emotional and psychological health. With this as the top area of your attention then you may have an easier time to accept a lesser degree of involvement in your work and relationships.When you feel angry, try to examine if underlying the anger are feelings of stress, fear, insecurity regarding your position in relationship to the person toward whom you feel angry. Anger is often the surface reaction to more destabilizing emotions like fear and insecurity.Gradually by nurturing and comforting yourself, living at a pace which is uniquely comfortable to what and how much you can handle, you'll regain your trust in both yourself and relating to others.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're experiencing significant challenges since your PTSD diagnosis. Managing PTSD symptoms can be complex and may require a combination of different approaches. Here are some steps that might help you get your life back on track: 1. Reach out for help: Connect with mental health professionals, support groups, or trusted friends and family members. Their support and understanding can be essential to managing your symptoms and maintaining good mental health. 2. Therapy: Consider trauma-focused therapy, such as Eye Movement Desensitization and Reprocessing

Context: After first meeting the client, what is the process that a counselor facilitates?
Response: There are probably no two therapists alike because first and foremost we are human beings!And...our personalities may somewhat guide how we go about getting to know you, identifying what you would like to be different in your life and developing a plan to get where you would like to be. The very most important thing that will determine a successful outcome is the healthy therapeutic relationship between you and your therapist. If you don't feel safe, comfortable and ready to work together, then it is likely not a good fit. And that's OK...speak up and the therapist should assist you in finding someone you can readily work with.
LLM: After the initial meeting, also known as an intake session, the counselor will carefully assess the client's needs and develop a treatment plan. This may involve further sessions for diagnostic evaluation, gathering more background information about the client's history and current situation, and deciding on the most effective therapeutic approach. The counselor may also provide resources, referrals or homework for the client to do between sessions. Throughout this process, open communication, empathy, and respect are key.

Context: I'm in my late teens and live with my dad. The only time I go out is for my college classes. Sometimes when I see my friends I want to talk with them, but sometimes I won't want to talk to them for days or even weeks. Sometimes I feel i'm not worth knowing or i'm never going to do anything right. Are they right, am I depressed?
Response: If we were in my office together, I would offer that most likely you are feeling somewhat depressed. It's most important for me to impress that you "don't have to live like this..." Other helpful information: Have you experienced similar symptoms before? Anyone in your family been depressed before? Based on other physiological signs, like quality of sleep, appetite, energy/motivation, I would present you with some treatment options, one of which would be to consult with a medication management provider to assess your symptoms and provide additional information for you to consider.
LLM: Based on what you've shared with me, it's possible that you may be experiencing depressive symptoms. Depression can manifest differently in different people, and your feelings of not being worth knowing or never doing anything right are common symptoms. However, I would strongly encourage you to seek a professional evaluation from a mental health professional. They can provide you with an accurate diagnosis, and develop a treatment plan tailored to your individual needs. In the meantime, consider reaching out to a trusted adult or support group to help you navigate these feelings. Remember, there's no shame in asking for help, and seeking treatment is a brave step towards improving your mental health.

Context: I know that I need to get past my feelings for this person I fell in love with, but t's so difficult to move on because he showed me feelings I've never felt before. I feel like I don't want to be without my genuine love for him, but logically, I know I need to be without him. I can't

Context: I want to live with my mom. My dad gets angry and makes me feel like everything is my fault. I still talk to my mom although My dad tells me that I'm no allowed to. I'm scared I will make the wrong decision and that my dad will hate me. How do I tell him that I want to live with my mom?
Response: Yes, from what you wrote, your dad doesn't accept responsibility for the way he feels and blames you for his feelings.I'm glad you recognize he's handling himself less as a grown person and more like a young child.I also understand your hurt and frustration that your father handles himself in a way which shows for now that he is unwilling to respect your wishes.Your decision is not surprising since most people wouldn't want to live with a parent who shows little interest to respect their kids' decisions.In terms of how to tell him your choice, do this in simple and most basic information terms. "I've decided for now to live w mom".I suggest to not offer reasons to him bc he doesn't seem interested in hearing them. Giving him reasons would likely trigger him to rebut them.If he asks questions, answer them as simply as possible.If and when you feel he is more willing to understand and know you, then you'd feel more free to have genuine dialogue with him.Right now he doesn't seem very ready to handle this.
LLM: I understand that you are feeling uncomfortable and unsafe with your father's reactions towards you. I also understand that you have a strong desire to live with your mother. However, making a decision to leave your father's home can be a complex issue, and it's important to approach this situation with care. Firstly, it's essential to remember that you have the right to express your feelings and needs, and it's okay to prioritize your emotional wellbeing. That being said, I would recommend considering the following steps: 1. Communicate: Express your feelings and needs to your father in a calm and respectful manner. Tell him that you're feeling unsafe and that you want to live with your mother. 2. Listen: Listen carefully to his response and try to understand his perspective. He may have valid concerns that need to be addressed. 3. Seek advice: You may want to seek advice from a family mediator, a therapist, or a trusted adult you trust. They can help you navigate this situation and provide you with guidance and support. 4. Consider alternatives: If leaving your father's home is not an option, explore other alternatives, such as counseling for your father or for yourself, or finding other resources in your community that may help improve the situation. 5. Keep your emotions in check: Try to remain calm and composed during this conversation, as emotions can run high. Stay focused on expressing your needs and feelings, and avoid blaming or attacking language. 6. Be patient: Change may not happen overnight, and this process may take time. Try to be patient and persistent in advocating for yourself and your emotional wellbeing. Remember, I'm here to support you through this process, and if you have any questions or concerns along the way, don't hesitate to reach out. Good luck!

Context: We rent from from my boyfriend's parents. His father drops by unannounced and stays for long periods of time. He lets himself into our home when we aren't there on a daily basis and takes our dogs to his house. He picks up our mail. He has NO boundaries. He's an opinionated, rude

Context: My dad makes me feel like shit and like I'm worthless. He calls me names and makes me feel depressed. I want to move out because I swear if I stay here, I'm going to lose it. What can I do?
Response: If you're actually able to afford to move out and support your own life, then this is a reasonable choice.If you're not in such a position and must continue for a while to live w your dad, then emotionally protect yourself from him.Doing so is much more difficult than maybe it sounds.Do you have privacy in your house and can you spend more time in a self-created safe space than around your dad?Also, limit the amount of dialogue you have with him so you don't offer him a chance to feel invited to criticize you.Are there other people who live in the household w you and dad?If yes, then are they similarly called names or are you singled out by him? What do the other family members do when they hear your dad calling you names?Is it possible the other family members don't realize how hurt and upset you are by your dad's behavior?If yes, then make a project for yourself to tell the other family members that you suffer from your dad's name calling.It is possible the other family members will step in and tell your dad to stop.Not necessarily that he will stop. Knowing the others support you emotionally and find you credible is helpful on its own.
LLM: I'm really sorry to hear that you're feeling this way and that your father's behavior is causing you so much distress. It's important to remember that no one deserves to be treated in such a way. Here are some suggestions: 1. Prioritize your safety: Your emotional well-being is important. If your dad's behavior reaches a point where you feel threatened, it might be necessary to consider moving out. 2. Reach out for support: Talk to someone you trust, such as a close friend or family member, about what's going on. Consider seeking the help of a mental health professional, too. 3. Set boundaries: Let your father know that his behavior is unacceptable and that you're going to take steps to protect yourself emotionally. This might involve limiting the amount of time you spend with him or not engaging with him when he's acting negatively. 4. Take care of yourself: Eat healthily, exercise regularly, and get enough sleep. Engage in activities that bring you joy and help you relax. 5. Consider alternative living arrangements: If moving out is not an option at the moment, explore other possibilities, like living with a friend or relative, or looking into affordable temporary housing options. Remember, these suggestions are just a start. You are in control of your life and have the power to make changes for yourself. It's important to take care of yourself and prioritize your emotional well-being.

Context: I just took a job that requires me to travel far away from home. My family and I really need this job. People keep telling me I have "anxiety" and I'm terrified of having an anxiety attack on the road. This is all new to me. What can I do?
Response: Anxiety or panic attacks can be very frightening. Here are a few "tools" you can use that will help in the short term: Keeping your mind occupied by listening to books on tape may help; Counting backwards from 100 in 7's; Naming cities that begin with each letter of the alphabet; Keeping some ice or an ice pack in a cooler beside you, which you may take out and hold in your hand or to your face; Soothing self-talk such as "This is uncomfortable, but I can handle it" or "I've

Context: How does a person start the counseling process?
Response: Most counselors are very approachable and many offer a 15 minute chat by phone to allow you to talk about your issue, and to get a feel for the counselor. If you like what you hear by phone, the next step is to set up a face-to-face meeting. Studies show that the most important element in effective therapy is that you feel a connection with your counselor. Trust your instincts and if you don't feel comfortable, let him or her know that you don't think it's a good fit. Many counselors list on websites like Psychology Today and Good Therapy. Visit these websites to learn more about therapists in your area.
LLM: Starting the counseling process usually begins with reaching out for help. You can contact a mental health professional, such as a psychologist or therapist, through their office or by utilizing services like telehealth. Once an initial appointment is scheduled, the counseling process typically involves discussing your concerns, setting goals, and developing a treatment plan together with your therapist. Remember, seeking help is a courageous step towards improving your emotional and mental well-being.

Context: I keep having these random thoughts that I don't want. Things like "you aren't worth anything." I know they're my own thoughts but it feels like someone else is saying it. What is wrong with me, and how can I stop having these thoughts?
Response: Many people have thoughts like those you describe, and often it feels like someone else is saying it because they are things that may have been said to you when you were very young. When young children hear negative things about themselves they tend to internalize these negative ideas and to form negative core beliefs. The good news is we can learn to stop these thoughts and to replace them with healthier thoughts. The first step is to catch yourself when you are thinking these thoughts, and to stay "stop!"; then replace it with another thought. So for instance, maybe you fail a test or get rejected by a romantic interest. You catch yourself saying "you aren't worth anything". Stop this thought, and replace it with "You didn't do as well on that test as you would have liked. Let's figure out how you can do better next time." Or "she may not want to go out with you, but someone else will". So the idea is to develop a voice of a "friend", who can tell you the kind of things you would say to your own best friend. You might also pick up the book, Feeling Good, by David Burns. He gives many tips for how to change Negative Self Talk.
LLM: It sounds like you are experiencing some symptoms of intrusive and distressing thoughts, which can be a sign of depression or anxiety. The fact that these thoughts don't feel like they're coming from you can make them feel even more unsettling. However, I want to assure you that you are not alone in experiencing thoughts like these, and there are effective ways to manage them. One approach to managing intrusive thoughts is to challenge them using cognitive-behavioral techniques. This means questioning the validity of the thought and looking for evidence that contradicts it. For example, identifying the thought "you aren't worth anything" as being an all-or-nothing statement and recognizing that there are indeed things about you that make you valuable. Another helpful

Context: I'm planning to have baby, so I have to quit smoking - but it's hard. Sometimes it's not a physical need, it's mental. I cannot help myself from thinking about smoking. What can I do to get rid of this addiction?

Response: Breaking any habit is no easy feat. Cutting down or cutting out cigarettes is very challenging, and there aren't any one size fits all solutions. Fortunately, there are a lot of tricks and tools that you can use to stop smoking. 1. Many habits that we have are paired habits. If we do one thing, then we will do the other thing. Think about the activities that you do when smoking and try to pair those activities with another activity other than smoking. For instance, many people smoke while they drive. Consider planning another activity to do while driving. (It might not be driving for you, but you get the idea! :)). It might be taking a walk instead of smoking on your break at work. 2. Create distance between you and the habit you are trying to break. This approach could be used in a variety of different ways. If you smoke first thing in the morning, consider leaving your cigarettes in a different room in your home. Walking the extra couple of feet could help you decide not to smoke. Leave your credit or debit cards at home and carry less emergency cash than a pack of cigarettes. With this strategy, you are trying to create some distance between you the cigarettes so that you have to jump through extra hoops to get them. 3. Consider cutting back before cutting out. If you are smoking 10 cigarettes a day, try smoking 9. Then cut back to 8 and so on. Having a plan to reduce harm may be more sustainable than cutting things out altogether. 4. You could also talk to your doctor about the safety of nicotine patches. If you aren't already pregnant, this could be a great resource to help boost your success. 5. Focus on what you are gaining instead of what you are loosing. You may be losing cigarettes, but you are gaining money, health, taste buds, an increased sense of smell, lung capacity, a healthy baby etc. You could plan small rewards/ treats with the money you save from decreasing cigarette purchases. I recommend making these purchases small and frequent to keep up the momentum rather than waiting for a big payout a couple of months down the road. Good luck! Cutting out cigarettes will be good for you and your baby.

LLM: I understand that quitting smoking, especially during pregnancy, can be challenging. It's great that yourecognize the importance of quitting for the health of your future child. While physical cravings can be addressed with methods like nicotine replacement therapy or cold turkey, the mental aspect of your addiction is equally important to manage. Here are some strategies that might be helpful: 1. Identify your triggers: Keep a journal to track when and where you feel the strongest urges to smoke. This way, you can plan ways to avoid those situations or have coping mechanisms ready. 2. Explore healthier alternatives: Find alternative activities to occupy your time and hands, such as chewing gum or taking a short walk, to replace smoking. 3. Build a support system: Surround yourself with people who encourage your healthy lifestyle choices, such as friends, family members, or support groups. 4. Practice relaxation techniques: Stress and anxiety can trigger the urge to smoke. Try using relaxation techniques like deep breathing or progressive muscle relaxation to calm your mind and help manage feelings of stress. 5. Stay focused on the positive:

Context: I am in a high stress position for a tech company. I am being overworked and underpaid for my contributions and it is not only giving me anxiety, but also demoralizing. What can I do to manage my stress?
Response: Being in this position is tough. If seeking another career opportunity isn't viable, there are a couple of things you can do to manage stress on the job. 1. Have a ritual to begin the day: Consider setting a one sentence intention and plan tasks for the day2. Take the breaks you are offered. I know it can be difficult to step away from your desk to eat lunch or take 10-minute breaks during the day, but prioritize this if you can. Sometimes 30 minutes of downtime and fresh air can help you feel better. 3. Have a ritual to end the day: If you commute by car consider an end of the day playlist. Take a walk. Light a candle. Clear your desk and write tasks for the next day. Whatever it is, send a signal to your brain that it is time to end the day.4. If you do work from home or are expected to be available after hours, set boundaries where you can. Set a timer for answering emails and stick to that. Have phone free meals. Try to engage in activities that are rejuvenating like spending time the friends and family. 5. Try to limit alcohol/ drugs. Move as much as you can. Get outside in natural sunlight. These are just ideas/ suggestions. Even doing one of these things could be a step in the right direction. Best of luck!
LLM: I understand your situation is challenging. Here are some suggestions for managing your stress as a first step: 1. Prioritize self-care: Make sure you're getting enough rest, eating a balanced diet, and engaging in regular physical activity. 2. Manage your time effectively: Identify your most pressing tasks and allocate your time and energy accordingly. 3. Learn stress-management techniques: Consider practicing mindfulness meditation, deep breathing exercises, or progressive muscle relaxation to help reduce anxiety. 4. Set clear boundaries: Communicate with your employer about your workload and expectations, and seek support from your colleagues or management when needed. 5. Stay organized: Keep a detailed to-do list to help prioritize your tasks and avoid feeling overwhelmed. 6. Stay positive: Try to focus on the things that give you purpose and motivation, rather than the stressors. 7. Consider seeking professional help: If your stress persists despite trying these strategies, it may be helpful to speak to a mental health professional.

Context: I'm dealing with imposter syndrome in graduate school. I know that by all accounts I am a phenomenal graduate student, and that I am well-published. I am well liked by students and faculty alike. And yet I cannot shake the feeling that I'm going to be found out as a fraud. How can I get over this feeling?
Response: It sounds like you are on the right track. Recognizing these nagging thoughts of self-doubt as "imposter syndrome" is a huge step in the right direction. From what you have written here, it appears that you are able to challenge your own thoughts and provide yourself with evidence that counteracts the imposter syndrome. Continuing to remind yourself of what you have accomplished and looking at the facts at hand can help diminish doubt. Remember, many successful people battled imposter syndrome on the way to the top (and still manage it). It might be helpful

Context: I just feel sad all the time and I don't like anyone in my family. I feel like they're trying to control me and won't let me grow.
Response: Understandably the idea of someone who tries to control you, is good reason to feel sad.Your feelings sound like they are very strong and meaningful in your life.Keep in mind that your feelings about others has more to do with one's own self-view than with what the other person is actually doing.Unless the people in your family are actually interrupting and impeding your life in practical ways or by intimidation or other verbal ways to inhibit you, then there is a great chance your feelings of being controlled by other family members has more to do with your fears to be who you are than with any family members' actions.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear that you're feeling this way, but it's important to remember that your feelings are valid. It's normal to have ups and downs in life, and to feel sad or disconnected from family members at times. However, if these feelings persist, it's crucial to seek support from a mental health professional or trusted loved one. It seems like you're experiencing some conflict with your family, and it's natural for this to bring up emotions of sadness and frustration. It might be helpful to have open and honest communication with your family members about your concerns and feelings. Remember that healthy communication is a two-way street, and that it's important for everyone to listen actively, validate each other's emotions, and find common ground. It's also crucial to remember that no one has complete control over another person's life, and that everyone has the right to make their own decisions. It's important to find ways to assert your autonomy while also respecting your family's needs and boundaries. In the meantime, it might be helpful to engage in activities that bring you joy and help you feel more in control. This can include things like taking care of your physical health through regular exercise, practicing relaxation techniques such as deep breathing or meditation, or pursuing hobbies or interests that bring you a sense of fulfillment. Remember, it's okay to ask for help, and seeking support can be a sign of strength rather than a sign of weakness. Consider reaching out to a mental health professional, who can offer guidance and support as you navigate these challenging emotions.

Context: I don't know how to tell someone how I feel about them. How can I get better at expressing how I feel?
Response: "Practice makes perfect"!Simply by expressing yourself and listening to if others listen and understand you, then modifying your next try with whatever improvements you think of based on the impressions you feel others have of you, will progress your self-expression.Also, one way to lessen the tension before speaking to someone is to tell them you feel unsure on how best to express yourself. This way you've prepared them to be patient with whatever words you do state.
LLM: That's a common concern, patient. Expressing emotions can be challenging for many people. Here are some steps that might help you: 1. Identify your emotions: Take some time to understand what you are feeling. Ask yourself, "What am I feeling right now?" Emotions can be complex, so give yourself permission to explore them. 2. Label your emotions: Use specific words to describe what you

Context: My mother is combative with me when I say I don't want to talk with her about my depression. She hasn't been supportive of me in the past and she isn't someone that I feel comfortable opening up to. She constantly tries to instigate conversations where she asks me questions that I don't want to or can't answer. I tell her I don't want to talk and she starts arguments with me. How can I get her to understand?
Response: Your situation sounds extremely frustrating.You're doing the right move to state you don't want to discuss your depression with her.I guess you could ask if she would like to know your reason to not speak w her about your depression. If you feel she can handle a reasonable conversation, and you would like to tell her your true reason, then schedule this or bring up the topic at a neutral time, not in the middle of an argument.Having an unsupportive mom is difficult enough to accept. You may feel greater success and peach of mind to meditate on accepting her lack of understanding than to engage in arguing when she starts this.
LLM: I understand that it's frustrating when someone doesn't respect your boundaries, especially during difficult conversations about your emotional well-being. It's important to remember that you have the right to choose who you open up to and how you communicate about your depression. Here are some steps you can take to communicate your needs more effectively: 1. Be clear and firm about your boundaries: When your mother initiates conversations about your depression, calmly and clearly state that you don't feel comfortable discussing it with her at that moment. Use "I" statements to express your feelings: "I don't feel comfortable discussing my depression with you right now." 2. Set consequences for boundary violations: Let her know that if she continues to instigate conversations about your depression despite your request to stop, you will no longer engage in those conversations. For example, "If we continue to argue about this, I will have to end the conversation." 3. Repeat the process: It's likely that your mother will continue to push the subject, so you may need to repeat the same communication several times before she understands. Don't let her intimidation or arguments deter you – stay calm and firm in your boundaries. 4. Explore alternative sources of support: If your mother is not supportive or is causing distress during conversations about your depression, consider finding alternative sources of emotional support, such as a trusted friend, family member, mental health professional, or support group. If the situation continues to escalate or become dangerous, do not hesitate to reach out to a mental health professional or support organization for further guidance. Remember, your mental health is important and prioritizing it should be your top priority.

Context: I am in my early 20s and I still live with my parents because I can't afford to live alone. My mother says that if I live under her roof I have to follow her rules. She is trying to control my life. What should I do?
Response: Hi! I'm sorry you are having such a tough time with this situation. I have worked with a number of young adults in their 20's who have had to move back home after college , or even stay at home through the college years. Bottom line is that either way , it is so difficult when you are

Context: My daughter seemed to be developing at a normal rate until about the age of 10. She then started to act younger than she is. Now she only wants to play with younger kids and she doesn't act her age. I don't know why this is happening. Is this normal?
Response: Hello.It sounds like you are really concerned about your daughter because you have noticed a significant change in her behavior . It's really a great first step that you are reaching out to get some ideas about what might be going on . You are clearly an observant and hands on mom who wants to be sure that her daughter is ok.This is a tough question to answer without more information . With that said , I have found that "under stress people regress." In other words , many people , children and adults alike , often regress and behave differently - as if they were younger than their actual age - when under stress . Therefore , my first question would be : has anything been happening recently that is causing your daughter stress ? This could be anything from conflict at home , recent changes such as moving , divorce , a loss of some kind , switching schools , or losing a friend or friends . Additionally , sometimes if children are feeling bullied or left out by same age peers , they may gravitate toward younger playmates as a way to boost their social confidence . I would suggest that you think about what stressors / changes may have occurred recently. You may also want to check in with her teacher (s) to see if they have noticed any changes in your daughter's behavior at school .I also think that you can have a conversation with your daughter in order to see if you can get a sense about whether or not something has been bothering her. Something as simple as " I have noticed that you aren't spending time with the friends you used to hang out with ; it seems like you have been playing with a lot of younger kids lately . Am I right about that ? " and then if she says yes you might ask a few questions such as : "did something happen with your friends that is making you not want to be with them?" "Has something been bothering you lately ? Are you feeling upset or worried ? " If she denies that there is anything wrong you might even say " I know that sometimes when I feel stressed or worried , I tend to act a little differently - sometimes I withdraw from my regular group of friends , or I get cranky and feel less like myself . I wonder if something like that is happening with you ?" If you are really concerned and not getting any answers from her and / or her teachers , perhaps you can consult with a therapist to discuss your concerns further and decide if it might help for your daughter to talk to a therapist a few times , or at the very least you can get more specific tips from a therapist about how to approach this issue with your daughter more effectively . The more detail you can provide about what you have noticed with your daughter , including any changes or new stressors , any possible patterns to this behavior , if school has become more difficult socially and or academically , the more a therapist can guide you about how best to handle your concerns and talk with your daughter in a way that is helpful to her. Good luck! I believe that this may just be a phase and it seems to me to be well within the normal range of children's behavior. I do, though, think that you will feel more assured about this if you can get to the bottom of what's going on .
LLM: I understand your concern, but what you're describing is not uncommon for pre-adolescent children. This is a phase known as regression or pseudodeviation, which is a normal part of

Context: After first meeting the client, what is the process that a counselor facilitates?
Response: Hi. This is an excellent question ! I think that the answer probably varies depending upon the particular therapist . In my work with people , once we have met and I have gotten an idea of the person'a concerns and the issues they want help with , I spend the next few sessions gathering as much history and as much information about the client's current concerns in order to formulate some ideas about what may be causing distress . I would then share my thoughts with the client to see if they feel I am understanding them and on the right track. We would then discuss the best plan to address the client's concerns . Usually I will suggest strategies that I think may be helpful and ask the client for feedback about whether or not they think my suggestions feel helpful . I always encourage clients to be really honest with me about this. I tell them that I would hate for them to agree to try things that they know they won't try just to avoid "hurting my feelings" or "offending me." I want to be helpful and while I have the expertise as far as typically helpful strategies, I really like to work collaboratively and have clients tell me what they do and don't like / agree with or not agree with when I share my thoughts about a treatment plan . We the work together to come up with a plan that will be helpful , but also realistic and then revise it and try new things if necessary as we go along. If things aren't improving , I am very happy and willing to try something new ! I hope this is helpful for you !
LLM: After the initial meeting or intake session, a counselor will begin the therapeutic process by establishing a therapeutic relationship with the client. This involves creating a safe and trusting environment where the client feels comfortable sharing their thoughts, feelings, and experiences. The counselor will also assess the client's needs and concerns, and use various therapeutic techniques and modalities to help the client achieve their goals. This may involve setting up ongoing sessions, creating a treatment plan, or making referrals to other professionals as needed. The exact process may vary depending on the specific needs and unique circumstances of the client.

Context: I start counseling/therapy in a few days (I'm freaking out) but my main fear is that I'll cry and embarrass myself, is it something to worry about?
Response: Hi there ! As someone who has practiced as a clinical psychologist for 25 years , I would say that crying is NOTHING TO WORRY ABOUT AT ALL ! Almost every single person I have worked with cried at one point or another. Starting therapy takes a lot of courage; when you work with a therapist ,once you feel safe , you talk about a lot of very private and potentially emotional things that you may have never discussed with anyone before. I have seen people cry with sadness , cry with relief at releasing painful things they have held onto for a long time, cry because they feel so relieved that they finally feel heard. I myself have sometimes cried with clients because some things they talk about are so profoundly moving. I can assure you that most , if not all , therapists expect clients to cry and there is nothing to be embarrassed about. Crying can be very cathartic and can allow us to release a lot of painful feelings we have been stuffing down. Crying is often a sign that you are really working things through and getting in touch with feelings that

Context: My ex-wife married and used me to have a child. She now uses that child as a pawn. I know my child misses me, but I need to move on and not live in the past. How do I do this? Do I see my child as much as possible or very little? Is it more confusing for the child?
Response: The thing that confuses a child the most is for a parent to come and go from their life. Children have a way of making things their fault, even when they have done nothing wrong. Because of this, when parents cut off contact, the child thinks it's their fault. As hard as that already is for a child, it is even worse when a parent pops in and out of their life. This makes the belief even more strong for them. They start to think, "why does dad keep leaving? What am I doing to keep making him go away?"I believe a child needs both parents in their life. Whether she used you for a child or not, that child still exists and never asked for this. They didn't ask to be born into drama and two parents that can't make things work. You can move on and start over while still maintaining a relationship with your child. If you start over far away, this may mean less visits but you'll still be a part of their life. Just make sure when you make a commitment to this child to stick to it. Every child deserves that much. Good luck to you! :-)
LLM: I understand that this situation is difficult for you, and it's natural to feel conflicted about how to approach your relationship with your child in the context of your ex-wife's new marriage. First, it's important to recognize that children benefit from consistent and stable relationships with both parents, whenever possible. This doesn't necessarily mean you need to see your child every day, but regular and meaningful contact is important. However, if the current situation is causing you emotional distress or negatively impacting your ability to parent effectively, it might be better to limit your contact for a time while you work on healing and moving forward. It's crucial to communicate openly with your ex-wife about your concerns and find a resolution that works best for all involved, particularly your child. Remember, the most important thing is the best interests of your child, and doing what's necessary to maintain a healthy, positive relationship with them. If you continue to struggle with these feelings and emotions, it may be helpful to seek the guidance of a mental health professional, such as a therapist, who can offer you support and suggestions tailored to your unique situation.

Context: My grandson's step-mother sends him to school with a pink Barbie backpack as a form of punishment.
Response: Absolutely not! It is never in a child's best interest to use humiliation as punishment. This can lead to issues in the relationship between parent and child as well as the child's social relationships. Kids have a hard enough time. To then go and cause them embarrassment is unconscionable. The entire job of a parent is to prepare their child to become a successful, healthy adult. You do this by using healthy ways to teach a child when they make a mistake. Discipline shouldn't be seen as punishment. It should be seen as a way to teach a lesson. What lesson could this possibility be teaching him? Absolutely nothing. Meanwhile, she is most likely damaging her relationship with him and causing great distress in his school day and peer interactions. She should

Context: My boyfriend is in recovery from drug addiction. We recently got into a fight and he has become very distant. I don't know what to do to fix the relationship.
Response: I'm sorry you have tension between you and your bf.A relationship means two people who relate, right?! If only one person does all the work to change their approach, what they expect, what they offer the other, then this becomes the new problem to solve.If you've already done a significant amount of reflection and change in the way you relate to him, then the next step may be to be patient as long as possible while he decides what to change about his part in the relationship toward you.Substance abuse recovery requires profound effort and reflection. If it is successful then the result will show very different qualities in your bf than the ones you know currently.He may be so absorbed in the recovery that he can only concentrate on this. Of course if the fights persist and you have been patient for what feels too long, then there are different questions to address.
LLM: I'm sorry to hear about the difficult situation in your relationship. It's important to remember that recovery from addiction is a complex process and can be challenging for both the individual in recovery and their loved ones. It sounds like your boyfriend may be going through a difficult period, and this distance could be a way for him to cope with his emotions or the stresses of his recovery. You can't force him to open up or fix the relationship, but you can express your concerns and emotions in a calm and respectful way. It might be helpful to have an open and honest conversation about how you're feeling and how his behavior is affecting you. Keep in mind that he may not be able to fully engage in the conversation due to his recovery needs and focus. Another suggestion is to learn more about addiction and the recovery process, as well as how best to support a loved one through this time. Reaching out to support groups or counseling services specifically for partners of individuals in recovery can be helpful in gaining understanding and resources for navigating the ups and downs of this experience. Ultimately, it's essential to prioritize your own emotional well-being and make decisions that are best for you. It's not uncommon for relationships to change during this time, and it's essential to consider what's going to be most beneficial for both you and your partner in the long term. Remember, you can't control another person's actions, but you can control how you respond and how you take care of yourself.

Context: The birth mother attempted suicide several times while pregnant. The adopted mother was terminally ill upon adopting the baby and died when the child was just over one year old. The adopted father then remarried to a physically, psychologically, and emotionally abusive woman. The child was placed in foster care at 11 years old. What might be the long term effects on an adult with this childhood history?
Response: The true answer is, "no one can really say with certainty".The variables are the way this child absorbs and adjusts to these significant changes in their life. All anyone can do is guess at this point and there's no good reason to guess.The only general certainty is that the adult whom this child becomes will have had a profound encounter with the biggest types of human losses a child

Context: I think adult life is making him depressed and we often sleep in on weekends untill 1 or 2 pm. We just eat, smoke weed, watch movies, and he'll go on his phone all day. He doesn't seem motivated to do much and he's often angry. I have no clue how to help him take his mind off the negative, or to distract him into a different light. How do I help him?
Response: How do you help yourself to believe you require more than what he offers to you?What do you get from this relationship which feels satisfying?To answer this question may in the longterm be the best way to help your bf.
LLM: I understand that you're concerned about your loved one's depression and lack of motivation. Here are some suggestions that could potentially help: 1. Encourage a daily routine: Having a consistent routine can help improve mood and provide a sense of structure and stability. 2. Encourage physical activity: Regular exercise can help improve mood, reduce anxiety and depression, and boost energy levels. 3. Help him discover new hobbies or rekindle old ones: Engaging in activities that bring joy and a sense of accomplishment can help in distraction from negative thoughts. 4. Encourage social connections:"Socializing with others can provide emotional support and reduce feelings of isolation." 5. Discuss the possibility of seeking professional help: Sometimes, mental health issues require the help of a mental health professional to provide effective interventions. 6. Encourage healthy eating habits: A balanced diet can help boost energy levels and boost mood. 7. Encourage limiting the use of substances like weed: While they may be used as coping mechanisms, they can also contribute to worsening mood and overall health. 8. Encourage setting and working towards achievable goals: Setting and working towards achievable goals can help provide a sense of purpose and accomplishment. 9. Encourage seeking out therapy: Speaking with a therapist can provide effective interventions and help in learning coping skills for managing depression and negative thoughts. 10. Be supportive: Show unconditional love, care, and support, and be there to listen and validate their feelings.

Context: I just took a job that requires me to travel far away from home. My family and I really need this job. People keep telling me I have "anxiety" and I'm terrified of having an anxiety attack on the road. This is all new to me. What can I do?
Response: hmm this is a tough one!
LLM: I understand that this is a difficult time for you and your family, and the added stress of travel and the fear of having an anxiety attack can be overwhelming. Here are some suggestions that might help you: 1. Learn about anxiety: Understanding the signs and symptoms of anxiety can help you feel more in control. You might find it helpful to read books or articles on anxiety, or speak with a mental health professional. 2. Practice relaxation techniques: Deep breathing exercises, progressive muscle relaxation, and visualization can all help to reduce anxiety. These techniques can be practiced anywhere, including while you are traveling. 3. Establish a routine: Stick to your normal routine as much as possible, including eating regular meals, getting enough sleep, and engaging in regular physical activity. 4. Create a support system: Stay in touch with friends and

71	I need help coping with depression as a result of stress	My depression has been reoccurring for a long time. It all started when I was being bullied in high school. In ninth grade, my principal told me I needed to stay home for a couple days to protect myself while she spoke to my classmates. I needed professional help for my stress because I was having crying spells from the stress of going to school and confronting my classmates. After that, I was fine for a couple of years. I entered my first year of college in a really tough program with high demands of expected work. I believe my depression re-booted from there with the stress. I began to cut myself because a friend of mine at the time told me how she used to do the same and it used to feel good for her. Obviously, that wasn't the right choice. I regret ever doing that, seeing as even though I'm not self-harming anymore, I always look back at that time whenever I feel very stressed. I have a big problem with handling problems in life. Whenever a problem arises, I get stressed and I feel hopeless, as if it's not going to get better. I get way too stressed from my problems, which leads to overreacting a lot (especially when talking to others), which then leads to depression. I have a hard time coping with stress because I know that if I could handle it easily then I wouldn't be sad all the time, and I would say and do the right thing instead of overreacting to my loved ones.	https://counselchat.com/questions/i-need-help-coping-with-depression-as-a-result-of-stress	depression	Cimberly R. 119	Should I go back on my medicine?	I have experienced cycles of depression for the past four years, and it hits me harder every time it comes back. This past time, it was extremely debilitating, so I went on Wellbutrin. I could feel the effects of the medicine after the first week. A month and a half later, I decided that my depression was being caused by my own unwillingness to move forward and address my behaviors and thoughts that were keeping me in a place of despair. I became worried that the medicine was making me complacent and prohibiting me from working out what I needed to in my life to bring back true fulfillment. I stopped taking it a month ago and feel okay; a lot of the anxiety it was paired with has gone away. However, I still don't feel my sense of self has been completely regained, and I have days where I feel a zombie-like haze of having no interests or the ability to fully concentrate on anything. 125	Relationships cause me anxiety and nausea	anxiety issues lately. Whenever I get close to being in a relationship, some kind of anxiety takes over and keeps me from the relationship. This anxiety causes me depression at times and even makes me want to vomit. While a semi-relationship should be joyous, for me, it’s an emotional nightmare I can’t get to the bottom of. I’ve had this before and had to leave the semi-relationship to avoid throwing up every time I made contact with my crush. What could be the reason behind this? Is it massive nerve problems? Is it a fear of a bad relationship? While I’m not quite ready to be in one anyway, I want to get to the bottom of this for a brighter future in which I can be in one. 		I just got out of a two year relationship. I broke up with my boyfriend because he wasn't showing any affection at all. He was talking to other women and lying about it. It pushed me away and hurt me, but I'm still in love with him. A couple days after our breakup, he was talking to someone new. He told me he wasn't sure if he loved me. I cried for several days, lost my appetite, and couldn't sleep. Our whole relationship was only us. We didn't have friends. It was me and him against the world. We didn't talk to anyone else because we only wanted to talk to each other. We hung out constantly and Skyped to sleep every single night. Then, when I cut

I asked multiple times if he loved me and asked to make sure he wasn't just saying that because of me being so depressed. He promised and assured me he loved me. He came over after that, and we had sex because he wanted to. He went the home that night and told me he didn't love me, and he lied because he was scared. He told me I wasn't attractive, I wasn’t beautiful to him, and that I changed. He also told me he was 100% sure he'd never love me again. I'm still in love with him. Why do I love him? How do I stop? 408	I'm dating a boy that my religious parents don't like, and I'm having trouble finding my identity	I'm a young adult woman, and I have trouble finding my true identity being at home. This all started when I had a boyfriend about 10 months ago. My boyfriend and I were dating for a couple months and decided to get in to sexual acts. At the time, I was pretty religious, but I let this happen. I don't know why. I felt kind of guilty but mostly because I know my parents wouldn't like it. My parents are very religious—they're Christians. We did things every time he'd come over to my house. We didn't have anything to do at our house, so we would get tempted to do things when we'd watch movies by ourselves. One day, my parents found out I did this stuff with him because my dad read my messages. As soon as my dad found this out, he told my mom. They were both aggravated. They told me he was just a boy that wanted to get inside my pants. They said he wanted me for sex and he's not a Christian. I took their advice and broke up with him. Once we broke up for about a month, I decided to get back together with him a little after school started. My parents found out eventually, and I decided to not listen this time. I would constantly talk to my boyfriend about what they say about him: how's he's not the right one for me, and God totally forbids him. I would kind of try to break up with him, and	https://counselchat.com/questions/i-m-dating-a-boy-that-my-religious-parents-don-t-like-and-i-m-having-trouble-finding-my-identity	spirituality	Margaret Van AckerenMA, LMFT	https://counselchat.com/therapists/margaret-van-ackeren-yorba-linda	What a tough situation you must be in, fe is (if you haven't already), have a calm re them. 		then eventually I would just never listen to my parents. They're always yelling at me about how I shouldn't date this boy. I felt too old to listen to them. Now I'm kind of just stuck. Is the real me religious? Have I been brainwashed by him? I don't talk to my parents anymore about him, and my parents think I'm deceiving because of it. They threatened me that if I'm still with him, I can't do track and they won't support me. They've also called me slut, and now they called me basically a devil worshipper. They say my boyfriend is taking me away from my parents. I'm actually very happy with him. They also say I'm living a separate life at home than I am at school. They say they want what's best for me and love me because they adopted me.

Meanwhile, I did not realize that my mom was doing hardcore drugs. My mom went to prison for that and lost her café. We live in a very small town, so everyone knew about it, and I was bullied because of who my parents were. My dad ended up getting in with the wrong people and went back to prison. My mom and him had a mutual friend and often hung out at that person’s house. My parents did not get along at this point. We were driving him home one day from this house, and my mom stopped the car and kicked him out. He got out of the car, went to the driver’s side, and punched my mom in the face. I got out and told him not to hit my mom. At that point, I was really scared and mad that he did that, so I ran towards him to stop him. He literally picked me up and threw me on the back of a gravel road. I couldn't even walk. My mom tried to help me, but he started choking her. I hobbled over, and she barely got into the car, and we quickly drove away and called the police and ambulance. He was so badly strung out on drugs. He went to prison again and seems to be doing well. I met up with him once with my grandma, and we had coffee, but he's so hard to handle. I think a lot of it is that I can't bring myself to forgive him. On the third night, my mother finally caught us, and I was kicked out of my house. I left with him of course, and we went from meeting each other to being like a married couple. It was very hard for us. His stepdad also kicked him out of his home, and we were staying at cheap hotels and friend's houses with the little money we had. I quit my job and dropped out of school because it was hard to do anything without a stable home. There were times when we had nowhere else to go but sleep in the car outside a Walmart parking lot. Our honeymoon stage, as they call it, probably only lasted one month. After that, it was a downward spiral. We were constantly arguing about money, food, and our families. We kept having the famous "you're doing it wrong—do it this way" argument. After six months, we moved across the country only to live the same thing, and that's when the violence started. One afternoon, after a serious argument, he got into his truck and threatened to leave me. I was frightened that he would actually go through with his word, given that we had just moved to a place where we knew no one. He told me to let him leave or he would hit me. He had once promised he would never touch me, so I challenged him to do it. He slapped me, and ever since that time, when we have serious fights, he loses control and hurts me. In 2013 we started a relationship, and he even asked me to move in with him since I lived out of state. I planned to move in with him in 2014 after I finished school and he found a job. However, during this time we had a few arguments and broke up with each other for a short period of time. We decided later to make it work. Shortly after, I found out that I was pregnant. I wanted to tell him during his next visit. However, he never came to see me and instead asked me for money. After I gave him money, he quit answering my phone calls and texts. Soon after, I experienced a miscarriage. I texted him about what had happened, and he didn't seem to care. I was extremely hurt by this. I still decided to move back as I had originally planned. He helped me with the move and replaced the money I had lent him. During this time, I asked if he wanted to be in this relationship because I needed to know. 477	Why do I get random spurts of anger over petty things?	I'm a teenager. I get random spurts of anger, like complete, pure rage. I figured it was hormones, but others notice it too. I get self-destructive. I used to cut but stopped. Now when I get mad, I bite my arms and fingers, pull my hair, scratch my face, or punch my thighs. Basically, I do things I can hide instead of breaking anything in my room and having to explain it to my mom. I don't live in a bad household. I have a great family, a great relationship with my boyfriend, and a good job. I have no idea what this is and I don't know how to control it. It's over any little thing. 679	My ex-boyfriend wouldn't let me have my daughter because I didn't know my stepdaughter's pick-up details	I want to get along as much as possible, and he agreed. However, we just had an incident where my ex-boyfriend started discussing drop-off details about my stepdaughter. I told him that he needed to ask my husband because I can't make decisions about my stepdaughter regarding the matter. That led to an argument. I told him all my concern is when I pick up my daughter. My stepdaughter's pick-up details are between my husband and his ex-girlfriend. I especially told him I didn't want to be involved. Somehow, he turned it around and then wanted to change the schedule we agreed on. He threatened me and got ugly because I wouldn't discuss my stepdaughter's matters with him. The point is there is so much drama. I try my best to get along with everyone. I don't understand where I went wrong (besides replying back to his question). I was very hurt and didn't understand. Then another week later, she told me she couldn't do it at all anymore. I was crushed! A few days later, she tells me how much she's missing me and "let's get together for lunch" or something like that. Then about two weeks later, we finally get together one night and we were so hot for each other (in love, not just sex), but she confessed that the reason for the sudden distance was that the father of her very young child told her he wants to get back together and this totally messed with her. So for her child's sake, she is now considering the possibility of allowing that to happen. She had told me all about him previously, and it is definite that she has little to no attraction to him, but she would do this putting herself in misery again for her child. Our love for each other is fully established and acknowledged, but she is torn and confused. 	How to help my	I'm a female freshman in high school, and this question is for my male best friend. At the start of freshman year, we dated for about a week before his parents ended it because they said he is too young to date. He has been dating a really sweet senior girl for a month or two. I have nothing against her except for the fact that she has Tim's heart. He is convinced that they are in love, and maybe they are, but I don't really believe him. When we break up, the very next day, she calls me and acts as if nothing has happened. She acts like everything is alright. This has been going on for two years. I do love her and care about her and her children a lot, but she seems really demanding as far as what she deserves from a man. She is always telling me that she deserves this and that from a man. 		Every once and a while, I think about my ex-boyfriend from four years ago, and my current friend. It’s like I can't get past it, and I need some kind of closure. I keep thinking about how we had something, but it got cut off due to parental intervention. Nothing was ever wrong with it. Now we've become friends, but there's this huge sexual tension between us, or at least I feel it when we're physically in the same place. Two summers ago, we saw each other casually for a while, but we never had sex then or while we were dating, which was only for two months three years ago. I'm now in my 20s, and my current boyfriend is amazing and in his 30s. Despite the age difference, I know we're a really good match. We've never really fought and are able to make compromises and talk everything out. I tell him everything. Also, my ex-boyfriend has a girlfriend now as well. He’s been seeing her on and off for the past two and a half years, besides when they broke up

Only a week later, he had gotten back together with his girlfriend. His girlfriend is kind of mean spirited. I'm sure she may be different around him, but I worry about him committing to her in the long run. They're supposed to move in together soon. But still, I feel this connection with my ex-boyfriend, and I feel like he does too. I don't know what to do. I need some closure or I'm not going to be able to move on from this. I don't know what it is, but it's driving me crazy. I'm so happy with my current boyfriend, and I know he will do everything in his power to make my life beautiful and fulfilling. He's such a good person. I also know my ex-boyfriend smokes marijuana and does other things, but I can't get it out of my head. I'm trying to take a nap right now between classes, but I can't sleep because my mind is racing. I've never been so hung up on something for this long ever. I want to just talk it out with my ex-boyfriend, but I don't know if that's a good idea because of the possibility that it could blow up in my face. If he told his girlfriend, everything could go wrong because she hates me. If my current boyfriend knew, he would be crushed. On one hand, I want my ex-boyfriend to say no to having feelings for me, but I would be terrified of what to do if he said he has feelings too. Where would I go from there?
